This well-known book, of which over 100,000 copies have been sold since its first publication in 1871, has taken its place as one of the standard works in the language, and the Publishers have felt that a well-illustrated edition would meet with a general approval. They have accordingly arranged for a series of pictures drawn from authentic sources illustrating the ARTS, INDUSTRIES, COSTUMES, COINS, DOMESTIC AND ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHITECTURE of the various periods dealt with, which will be carefully engraved under the direction of Mr. J. D. Cowley. An exhaustive series of PORTRAITS OF EMINENT PERSONS is also given, and Mr. GEORGE SCHAEFER, C.B., Director of the National Portrait Gallery, has given valuable assistance. There will also be a number of COLOURED MAPS, made by Mr. EDWARD STANFORD, AND COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS FROM MANUSCRIPTS, ILLUMINATED MISSALS, &c., executed in the highest style of Chromo-Lithography.

The "ILLUSTRATED SHORT HISTORY" is handsomely printed in Super-royal 8vo, and will be published in about Thirty Monthly Parts.

PALL MALL GAZETTE—"Altogether this edition of the 'History' will be far and away the best that has been published."

TIMES—"Copious, appropriate, and admirably selected illustrations. . . . Cannot fail to sustain and increase the popularity of that fascinating survey of our national history."

GLOBE—"What is now promised is likely to be the most thorough production of its species."

ANTI-JACOBIN—"Singularly handsome and valuable. . . . So finely printed and illustrated that it might fairly be called an édition de luxe."

GUARDIAN—"The form in which Mr. Green's book is now to be presented will be worthy of it. . . . Bids fair to be a remarkable success."

THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE.

Just ready,
THREE NEW EDITIONS
ON OXFORD INDIA PAPER.

"Notwithstanding its tenuity of substance, the opacity of the Oxford India paper is remarkable. Whether the type be large or small, its legibility is perfect, and the cloudy background, which is the usual penalty of printing on thin paper, is scarcely perceptible. In this result, no doubt, the excellence of the printing supplements that of the paper, and these together combine to make these thin editions so supremely admirable."—The Bookseller.

Ruby, 16mo, Thin, with Indexed Atlas, 956 pages
(6 $\frac{1}{2}$ by 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ by $\frac{3}{4}$ inches).

Turkey Morocco, limp, round corners, red under gilt edges, 12s. 6d.

And in various Superior Bindings.

Minion, 8vo, Thin, with Indexed Atlas, 956 pages

A FABLE FOR CRITICS.

By JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

PREFACE:—"This jeu d'esprit was extemporised, I may fairly say, so rapidly was it written, purely for my own amusement and with no thought of publication. I sent daily instalments to a friend in New York. He urged me to let it be printed, and I at last consented to its anonymous publication. The secret was kept till after several persons had laid claim to its authorship."

The Title of First Edition, published in 1848, is in verse, a facsimile of which is given, besides 26 Vignette Portraits of the English and American Authors of this time, whom the Author has so amusingly criticised. The Portraits represent the authors in 1818.

Crown 8vo, Portrait of the Author in 1842 with long curly hair, and 8 beautiful Photogravures, handsomely bound in cloth and imitation vellum.

Price to subscribers, 5s. net. On day of publication, Nov. 23, the price will be raised to 6s. net.

The VISION of SIR LAUNFAL.

JAPANESE POTTERY,

WITH NOTES

Describing the Emblems, the Poetical Associations, and other thoughts and subjects employed in the Decoration of the Ware, an Account of the Festivals, and of some of the Customs of Japan.

By JAMES L. BOWES.

Imperial 8vo, cloth, 600 pp., with Plates, £2 12s. 6d.
The "Extra Illustrated Edition," half-morocco, gilt top, £6 6s. (Only a few copies left.)

Japan Mail.—"It is a noble book... a book of the most valuable and genuine character. It is evident that Mr. Bowes has brought together a really representative collection, and that he has made every specimen it contains the object of careful research and intelligent scrutiny."
China Telegraph.—"Few are entitled to speak with absolute authority, but of these Mr. Bowes stands foremost. Virtually a complete history of the art. To the true connoisseur it needs little recommendation."

The Athenian.—"Produced with singular care and completeness.... A worthy sequel to the author's previous labours in the cause of Japanese art."

The Times.—"Worthy of its subject and its author."

The Art Journal.—"Remarkably free from mistakes."

The Saturday Review.—"Let us repeat our admiration of Mr. Bowes' beautiful and enticing volume."

The Architect.—"A guide for the collector, and the best of its kind."

The Builder.—"Not only one of the most beautiful, but one of the most useful and rational books upon Japanese art which has been published in England."

Notes and Queries.—"To collectors his books are as authoritative as is to the lover of Elzevir's the priceless book of Mr. Williams."

St. James's Gazette.—"The volume is one in which the connoisseur will delight."

DEAN & SON'S LIST

Handsomely bound, large post 8vo, 6s.

BY JEAN DE LA BRETE.

UNCLE: a Story of Modern French Life. Edited by JOHN BERWICK, and illustrated by R. Andre.

The French Edition of this novel has had a sale of sixteen editions in seventeen months, and the first review of the English Edition received by the Publishers says:—"One of the most fascinating novels written for years."

Large post 8vo, cloth gilt, 8s. 6d.

BY WILLIAM H. STACPOOLE, Author of 'F.R.S.,' &c.

THE THREE BOOTS.
A STORY OF PRESENT-DAY LONDON. Illustrated.
This clever novel turns upon an extraordinary hoax and a strange conspiracy.

Handsomely bound, large post 8vo, 6s.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN'S CORRESPONDENCE with the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, the late Charles Dickens, and others. Edited by FREDERICK CRAWFORD. With a Memoir of Andersen and Portraits.

Andersen's letters to his friends, which have been looked forward to as a literary treat, have a genuine ring about them, and most of them appear to have been written without any thought of their being published. Their great charm lies in their simplicity.

Handsomely bound, large post 8vo, 6s.

BY PHILIPPE TONELLI.

RETRIBUTION: a Corsican Vendetta Story. Illustrated by R. Andre.

"Mr. Tonelli's book has the advantage of being written by one who has been able to impart more of vivid local colouring to his sketches of Corsican peasant life than is found in other volumes."—Morning Post.

Handsomely bound, cloth gilt, gilt edges, large post 8vo, 10s. 6d.; or Library Edition, 2 vols. 6s. each.

BY ARTHUR GODDARD.

PLAYERS of the PERIOD. Being a Series of Anecdotal, Biographical, and Critical Monographs of the leading Actors, including Henry Irving, Beerbohm Tree, J. L. Toole, &c. Illustrated by Eric Bernard, J. Bernard Partridge, and other well-known Artists.

Now ready, large post 8vo, handsomely bound, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d.

SCENES THROUGH the BATTLE

SMOKE: being Reminiscences in the Afghan and Egyptian Campaigns. By the Rev. ARTHUR MALE, Army Chaplain at Lucknow, and in the Afghan and Egyptian Campaigns. With Portrait of the Author and 8 large Illustrations by Sidney Paget, War Artist to the Illustrated London News in these Campaigns.

Lord CRASHBROOK writes:—"Mr. Male's personal knowledge of the events makes his interesting book more valuable."

Large post 8vo, handsomely bound, 7s. 6d.

FRENCH SOLDIERS in GERMAN PRISONS:

being Reminiscences during and after the Franco-German War. By Canon E. GUERIN, Army Chaplain to the French Forces.

The work is illustrated with portraits of the leading actors in these terrible scenes. The thrilling narrative helps one to realise the denial and heroism of those who gave up much of the comfort of this life to tend the sufferings of the sick, wounded, and helpless soldiers suddenly interned in fortress and hospital.

Large post 8vo, handsomely bound, 6s.

SOUVENIRS of the SECOND EMPIRE:

or, the Last Days of the Court of Napoleon. By the COMTE DE MAUGNY, formerly Minister for Foreign Affairs.

This interesting volume of the reminiscences of a Cabinet Minister is full of anecdotes relating to all that passed amongst the Court and Society, the Clubs and the Theatres, in the reign of Napoleon III.; also numerous portraits and particulars as to the lives of all the celebrities of the period.

Crown 8vo, handsomely bound, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

THE DOYLE FAIRY BOOK.

Consisting of Twenty-nine Fairy Tales. Translated from Various Languages by ANTHONY R. MONTALBA. With 34 Illustrations by RICHARD DOYLE, a Memoir of Doyle, and an Introduction by a MEMBER of the FOLK-LORE SOCIETY.

Handsomely bound in blue cloth gilt, gilt edges, large crown 8vo, 6s.

DEAN'S FAIRY BOOK. A Companion to the "Doyle Fairy Book" (5s.).

This volume, which makes a splendid Presentation Book for a child, contains most of the favourite fairy tales of childhood, drawn from Perrault, old Chap-books, and the "Arabian Nights." The book is enriched with numerous excellent illustrations by Louis Mary, John Proctor, and other able Artists.

Large post 8vo, cloth, handsomely bound, 10s. 6d.

JAMES R. OSGOOD, McILVAINE & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

PHARAOH'S FELLAHS AND EXPLORERS.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS,
Author of "A Thousand Miles up the Nile," "Lord Brackenbury," "Barbara's History," &c.
Richly Illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth ornamental, 18s.

THE TIMES says: "Miss Edwards compiles with zeal, industry, and judgment, and the progress of Egyptian research is now so rapid, while its results are so full of varied interest, that readers who, without being professed Egyptologists, are fascinated by a subject which never relaxes its hold on those who have once yielded to its spell, cannot but be grateful to Miss Edwards for summarising the results of the most recent inquiries and discoveries in a form at once popular, attractive, and adequate. The work is copiously illustrated from various authentic sources, and should prove an invaluable companion to all who visit Egypt or study its ancient lore."

NEW NOVELS.

LITERATURE.

Il Principe. By Niccolò Machiavelli. Edited by L. Arthur Burd, with an Introduction by Lord Acton. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

DURING the last fifty years the Italian Renaissance of the fourteenth century may be said to have become again renescent in European literature. All its leaders, political as well as literary, have been subjected to an investigation so comprehensive in scope and so minute in detail that it is hard to see what doubtful issues can be left for future historians to solve. Among the rest, Machiavelli has been resuscitated and re-investigated. His old self-painted portrait, so to speak, black with the incrustations of centuries, no less than with the atramentous hues of his own brush and palette, has been cleaned and re-hung in a new light—if not with any perceptible effect in reducing the blackness, at least rendering the strange and rare chiaroscuro intelligible and consistent as a whole.

For ordinary Englishmen, even for those who claim to be educated, Machiavelli remains where Lord Macaulay's brilliant Essay left him. But for those who have cared to penetrate further, Prof. Villari's Life and Mr. Symonds's volumes on the Renaissance, together with his Life of Machiavelli in the last edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, have given all the information they can possibly need; while for professed students and scholars, who may have occasion for something like an exhaustive knowledge of the man and his times, the researches of modern historians and biographers have supplied materials which, in bulk and value, are positively bewildering. The reader who desires to see this proved is referred to Mr. Burd's bibliography—one of the many excellent adventitious features which give his Il Principe a foremost place in Machiavellian literature.

But in supplying a text copiously annotated with excellent notes, Mr. Burd has conferred on the English student of Machiavelli a new service of the greatest possible importance; for of all the writers of the Italian Renaissance, Machiavelli is probably the one whose works are most unknown to Englishmen at first hand. For this, two reasons may be assigned: (1) Englishmen, as a rule, have little interest in political methods, theories, and policies out of touch with their own mode of government. A despot, such as that limned in Machiavelli's Prince—cunning, astute, ruthless, and absolutely unscrupulous—has become too much a personage of ancient history, even if he ever existed in this country, to excite the susceptibilities of present-day Englishmen. (2) Notwithstanding various processes of white-washing to which Machiavelli has been subjected, his name continues to be one of the most execrated in English literature. Popularly he is regarded as the type of the wholly immoral politician: a man who, in the execution of his purposes, is restrained by no consideration of justice or humanity, to say nothing of the sanctions of religion: a political theorist, whose practical outcome and embodiment is represented by the infamous Caesar Borgia, of whom, indeed—so long as his political schemes were successful—he is content to be the almost unconditional panegyrist, and, so far as he was able, his humble and servile imitator and disciple.

The result has been that, like his alleged namesake "Old Nick," Machiavelli has been the victim of a denigration beyond the actual needs or justice of the case; and this has been followed by a supercilious neglect, altogether unjustifiable by all well-wishers to English culture and historical knowledge. This edition of Machiavelli's most important and most Machiavellian work must therefore be welcomed with all possible cordiality. Now Englishmen may ascertain, if they will, from the ipsissima verba of the man himself—not from expurgated or Bowdlerised translations—what Machiavelli was, what his political teachings were, and why his memory has become, more especially to Englishmen, an embodiment of detestation and obloquy. In order to make such an inference more legitimate, as based on the widest generalisation, Mr. Burd has not contented himself with giving the text of Il Principe with illustrative notes; he has added infinitely to the value of his work by adducing corresponding passages from the other works of Machiavelli, more especially from the Discorsi. The result of this is to give the English reader a general conspectus of the views of the author, gathered from all his best-known writings, and supplemented also sometimes from his correspondence. The elucidatory light which this method imparts to Il Principe is very great, and renders this edition—no pun is intended—facile princeps among all other editions of the book. One incidental outcome of this full presentation of Machiavelli's political opinions is to prove that the views set forth in Il Principe were the genuine matured conclusions of the man himself: that the political doctrines therein enunciated were not the product of any peculiar or accidental set of circumstances, as some have suggested. Henceforth the doubt which Macaulay expresses in the following sentences may be regarded as converted into approximate certainty:—

"We doubt whether it would be possible to find in all the many volumes of his compositions a single expression indicating that dissimulation and treachery had ever struck him as discreditable."

What effect this re-cast of Machiavelli's Il Principe may have on future English estimates of his character it is not easy to foresee. Not improbably it will revive one theory respecting him, which most men solicitous of the honour of human nature will wish were true, but which, nevertheless, is undeniably false—viz., that Machiavelli merely threw into the form of a didactic treatise, for satirical purposes, the maxims and political procedures in common use among the despots of the time. As Tommasini has put it, in the most exhaustive treatment of the question that has yet appeared: "Machiavellianism existed before Machiavelli." What he did was merely to transcribe its methods from his own intimate knowledge of contemporary and previous history. This is no doubt true, and its truth is conclusively demonstrated by Mr. Burd's notes to this edition; but though it has been alleged for the purpose, yet as a defence of the immorality of the Prince it is no more than saying, e.g., that vice existed before M. Zola, and that all that writer has done is to record its most repulsive features in the most cold-blooded and realistic manner possible. Doubtless, from the satirist's point of view, this might conceivably be done with the praiseworthy object of making vice more detestable, in harmony with Pope's dictum:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
As to be hated needs but to be seen."

But it is certain that neither Machiavelli nor M. Zola could have had such ethical purpose in view. They were merely intent—like a painter who chooses a repulsive or gruesome subject—on the visual representation of a hideous actuality. Indeed, Machiavelli certainly—of M. Zola perhaps an analogous judgment may be pronounced less certainly—intended his presentation of extreme political turpitude to have a didactic and even hortatory influence.

At all events, the theory thus mentioned is retrospective. If the Italian states in their mutual relations had been hitherto guided by no other principles than selfish greed and aggrandisement; if the despots of mediaeval Italy were accustomed to contend like beasts in the arena with all the callousness, ruthlessness, and ferocity of their wild nature, it is clear that there must have been some reasons precedent which accounted for such a condition of inhuman savagery. Those reasons are not far to find. As Settembrini and others have pointed out, chiefest among them is the fact that mediaeval Romanism had become, so far as civilising and ethical influences were concerned, a miserable failure. Not only had the corrupt teaching and example of the Papacy decreed a virtual divorce between morality and religion; but, by means of its temporal pretensions and actual sovereignty, the Papal power had itself become one of the savage beasts in the political arena, as ferocious and bloodthirsty as the rest. The methods of Il Principe, with all their diabolical turpitude, were but the transference to secular politics of the motives and procedures which had long held sway in ecclesiastical administration. As Lord Acton has well remarked in his learned Introduction (p. xxiii.):

"The divines who held these doctrines [viz., that heresy was punishable by death] received them through their own channels straight from the Middle Ages. The germ theory that the wages of heresy is death was so expanded as to include the rebel, the usurper, the heterodox or rebellious man; and it continued long after the time of Machiavelli."

And it is just this that gives us a clue to the theory of the Prince which is most accepted by the best Machiavellian students and scholars of our time, and which may be roughly distinguished as the Patriotic theory. In common with all the political theorists and practical men of his day, Machiavelli had long been indoctrinated with the teaching that the welfare and prosperity of the Church was the supreme standard of all human conduct and opinion. But it was a teaching which the disinterested patriot, no less than the selfish despot, found applicable to himself: either might say "Salus populi suprema lex," and in order to secure that salvation and repress every tendency to sedition which might seem to render it less attainable, might advocate or put in practice measures of every extreme degree of cruelty and unscrupulousness. Whatever steps conduced to order, stability, and firm rule were to be adopted without hesitation or flinching, no matter at what price of secret treachery or open violence. That Machiavelli did not dream of a United Italy, such as our own time has happily seen achieved, may be taken for granted. But his sympathies were republican and so far inclined to freedom; and Il Principe we may accept as an intimation of the terrible ruthlessness with which he would pursue any scheme which promised order, justice, and stability to an Italian state.

There are, however, questions connected with Il Principe which my diminishing space will not permit me adequately to discuss, and for a fair and enlightened consideration of which I must refer my readers to Mr. Burd's volume.

First, there is the critical question how far Machiavelli's political methods, with their cynical contempt for the rudiments of morality, may, under given circumstances, be considered needful to the smooth working of political institutions. On this point both Lord Acton and Mr. Burd have much to say. The former has brought together a number of quotations from modern political philosophers, generally favouring the standpoint of Machiavelli, and pleading that states, unlike individuals, are not amenable to the requirements of straightforwardness and honesty. Lord Acton concludes in a passage which I had better quote, as its allusive and indirect utterances do not easily lend themselves to a definitive conclusion:

"He [Machiavelli] is the earliest conscious and articulate exponent of certain living forces in the present world. Religion, progressive enlightenment, the perpetual vigilance of public opinion, have not reduced his empire or disproved the justice of his conception of mankind. He obtains a new lease of authority from causes that are still prevailing, and from doctrines that are apparent in politics, philosophy, and science. Without sparing censure, or employing for comparison the proper symptoms of the age, we find him near our common level, and perceive that he is not a vanishing type, but a constant and contemporary influence. When it is impossible to praise, to defend, to excuse, the burden of blame may yet be lightened by adjustment and distribution; and he is more rationally intelligible when illustrated by lights falling not only from the century he wrote in, but from our own, which has seen the course of its history twenty-five times diverted by actual or attempted crime."

I had intended setting side by side with Lord Acton's partial palliation of Machiavellianism the more frank and outspoken utterances of Mr. Burd, especially in his notes to the notorious eighteenth chapter; but the needed quotations would have encroached too much on my space. I can only commend my readers to turn to the volume themselves, with the assurance that they will find in Mr. Burd a guide in Machiavellian exegetics whose stress upon the eternal principles of morality is not likely to be biassed or weakened by a too partial or tender regard for the brilliant qualities of Machiavelli himself.

Before I conclude I may point out as a test of Mr. Burd's careful editing, and his determination not to leave any source unexplored that might throw light on the political and literary history of Il Principe, that he devotes some space to the alleged plagiarism which Niphus or Nifo made of Machiavelli's work in 1523. M. Nourisson made this the subject of an interesting communication to the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, and expended a good deal of indignation on the audacity of the plagiarism. On this point, MM. Deschamps and G. Brunet, in their supplement to the Manuel du Libraire, say that—

"M. Nourisson reste confondu de tant d'audace; nous sommes bien autrement surpris de l'impunité dont a joui le plagiaire, le caractère fier et jaloux du grand Florentin étant notoirement connu."

Now I cannot help avowing my suspicion that this alleged plagiarism is not quite what we mean by the term, and that the subject of Nifo's relation to Machiavelli needs further investigation. It is quite clear that Nifo did not appropriate Machiavelli's teachings as his own, but merely gave a synopsis of Il Principe as the commonly accredited political creed of the time, with the object of refuting it. This seems further shown by the fact that Nifo not only wrote the De Regnandi Peritia—the supposed plagiarism—in 1523, but published in 1521 a similar work entitled De Principe Libellus, in which he aims at making the typical ruler the embodiment not of all the vices, but of all the virtues of humanity, dwelling particularly on the Prince's obligations to clemency, to generosity, and to magnanimity. I hope I may be excused entering a little into this subject, as I happen to have both these exceedingly rare tracts of Nifo in my library, and also because I had some years ago to investigate the matter in reference to another question. If one lived in France, one might draw up, like M. Nourisson, a communication on the subject to the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques; but in England a few lines in a literary journal is all that is permitted to the bibliophile who takes a scholar's interest in such out of the way questions.

JOHN OWEN.

A Vision of Life. Semblance and Reality.
By William Gifford Palgrave. (Macmillans.)

SELDOM, surely, has English literature suffered a loss so painful and pathetic, as by the incompleteness of this wonderful book. Far greater poets have left imperfect far greater works, but not their one masterpiece. Mourn as we may over "Hyperion," we have the Odes; lament as we must for "Christabel," we have the "Ancient Mariner." But the late Gifford Palgrave, summing up in one great poem the experience of an unique and various life, and dying before he could accomplish it, commands our truest compassion.

"Ulysses, much-experienced man,
Whose eyes have known this globe of ours,
Her tribes of men, and trees, and flowers,
From Corrientes to Japan."

So Lord Tennyson addressed him, rightly enough.

Mr. Palgrave, son and brother of distinguished scholars, was educated at Charterhouse and at Oxford. Leaving Oxford with honours in classics and in mathematics, he received a commission in the Indian Army. An early enthusiasm for missionary work among the Arabs proved too strong for him, and he left the service to be received into the Catholic Church and into the Society of Jesus. For years he laboured in India, studied in Rome, lived a missionary life in Syria and Palestine, preaching and writing in Arabic, with a perfect knowledge of the Mahometan East. Upon the dispersion of his mission, owing to the Druse persecution, he undertook his great travels through Central and Eastern Arabia; and, returning after dangers and adventures of no common kind, quitted the Jesuits and the Church, to enter the diplomatic service. He was British Consul at Trebizond, at Manila, in Bulgaria, in Uruguay, and elsewhere. In the latter country he died, having been first married and afterwards reconciled to the Church. He wrote some five books of travel or of narrative, or of studies upon Oriental questions. He died at the age of sixty-two, leaving unfinished the Vision of Life.

Such a man's vision of life is worth the telling; and from the imperfect structure of his poem, we can see well what must have been the excellence of his unrealised design. The first book is, we have reason to conclude, preserved in its final form; but the other two are full of grievous gaps, conjectural readings, and outlines in prose of what was never accomplished in verse. Yet enough remains to show the beauty and the truth of Mr. Palgrave's poetry, and with what strength of vision he looked back in meditation upon his life, and forward in aspiration toward its last goal. Alike in spirit and in form, the poem is a Divina Commedia of modern times; and, as is but natural in modern times, both form and spirit are somewhat less lucid and less severe than their early model. Yet Mr. Palgrave handles the terza rima with a success at least equal to that of any other English poet: Shelley, Byron, Mrs. Browning, Mr. William Morris, Canon Dixon, in their diverse manners, have not more truly caught the moving measure of Dante. Canon Dixon, indeed, in the preface to his fine reflected poem Mano, writes :

“ This poem, in the Italian’s measure made,
Commended he, if it some deal observe
The law which on his verse the master laid,
From which the most do in our language
swerve,
Who have put forth the triple rhyme to essay
(Many of greater name than I deserve):
That round the stanza still the structure play,
At end arrested somewhat: this his law,
Who gave such wondrous music to his lay.”

Mr. Palgrave does not constantly observe that law; and it may be thought, that, essential as it is to Italian, in English it procures stateliness and precision somewhat at the expense of ease. Perhaps it is hardly possible to discuss the technical execution of a poem so fragmentary: it will be enough to give, as an example, a passage of some length, fairly representative of the whole:

“ O life of death compact, O priceless gold Deep-veined in granite doom, O diamond heaven,
Marred by dull earth and darkness manifold!
As who through formless clouds by tempest
riven,
Of phantom lights and shades, up-gazing sees
The untroubled splendour of the circling Severn,
Nor the mad railings of the storm, nor seas
Dashed in tumultuous spray, nor hail-blent rain,
May stain the brightness of that starry peace;
So the great calm of Love’s all circling reign Showed ’mid the phantom whirl, the shadowy war
Of flickering light and shades, that pass and stain;
And then beyond, a luminous point, a star Shone in the measureless depths, vivid and lone,
Centre and being of all things that are:
Semblance all else, or dark, or light; it shone
Absolute light, keen, insupportable.”

I may add, that in shorter passages, Mr. Palgrave has lines of a concentrated strength, not unworthy to remind us of Dante and of Milton. For example, the description of Nero:

“ Th’ unnatured Mime, who, crowned with poison flowers,
Trophied his own disgrace, twice matricide,
By Baiæ’s shore, and Rome’s fire-wasted towers.”

Dr. Farrar, in some seven hundred pages, has not come near that.

It is usual to praise the marvellous precision of Dante’s work: his definite description, his firm outline, his unshrinking exactitude of detail. True as all that is, it is also true that Dante can be, as Coleridge said of Persius, not obscure, yet hard. His astronomical ways of stating time and season are instances of that hardness; and Mr. Palgrave, in his zealous reverence for the Florentine, has not cared to make the progress of his vision very clear in such points. He is hard to follow, hard to disentangle; and the moral beauty of effect, which his vision of life produces, suffers some eclipse and loss. Yet the great plan is plain: it is, briefly told, the progress of nations and of men through the stages or “kingdoms” of ambition, of art, of religion, of literature, of physical science, of sensual love, and of heavenly love. In each kingdom, nations and men rise or fall, working out their fates; and the twin powers of life and death preside over that evolution. The final salvation is to be found only in the perfect love; and the name of love closes each canto, as each canto of Dante closes with the stars. The spirit of the poem is melancholy, austere, tragic, and piteous; the poet seems to have held with strong conviction a belief in the disastrous revolutions of national and personal life, their inevitable degradation and decay, till through pain and struggle they emerge once more into the light, and under the guidance, of divine love. That power, in the earlier portion of the poem, is hardly to be identified; in the later portion, love is the name and image of God incarnate. Among Mr. Palgrave’s firmest convictions is his conviction of the evil nature of material progress: mechanical labour, scientific absorption, democratic ignobility, he denounces with all the passion of Carlyle, but with an aristocratic austerity of his own. To him, a spiritual hope and influence is inseparable from all greatness or truth of character; and modern life is merely debased to the level of mortality. There is a strain of oriental detachment from sensuous comfort, a reliance upon nature in her simplest manifestations, by which Mr. Palgrave recalls to us certain other Englishmen of fame: the late General Gordon, Mr. Browning, and Mr. Oliphant. The eastern poems of Mr. Browning are full of a strange largeness and magnanimity, a freedom from pettiness and triviality: a sense of majesty in the open spaces of heaven, a Chaldean sense. To certain minds, the East, be it Arabian or Japanese, Persian or Hindu, is a magnet. Mr. Palgrave, deeply feeling that attraction, seems at times to pass from our western life into an oriental mysticism: or, like Blake, to view western life through spiritual counterparts. And the power of his revered faith is fully seen when, in place of a love that is intangible, he turns to a love that gives a profound meaning to personality, and a meaning finer than any mystic quietism. Arnold asks:

“ What bard,
At the height of his vision, can deem (Of God, of the world, of the soul,
With a plainness as near,
As flashing, as Moses felt,
When he lay in the night by his flock
On the starlit Arabian waste?
Can rise and obey
The beck of the Spirit like him?”

None: but the writer of this great imperfect poem felt not a little of that plainness, and gave not a little of that obedience.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

Seas and Lands. By Sir Edwin Arnold.
(Longmans.)

THE series of letters from America and Japan which Sir Edwin Arnold contributed to the Daily Telegraph, and which are now published in book form, are pleasant reading. The earlier letters from Canada and America give us the “impressions de voyage” of an enthusiastic play-pilgrim, but there is nothing of the guide book or diary in Seas and Lands; the chapters as they succeed one another are lively and full of information, and are embellished with descriptions of the places seen and the people visited, which are charming and delightful.

The first twelve chapters take us from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Montreal and Toronto, across to Niagara and then through the States. Those who have watched the waters of Niagara and felt the fascination of the sight will recognise that Sir Edwin has well described the sensation they impart when he says, “Niagara appears not terrible, but divinely, deliciously graceful, glad and lovely.” In the New England States, and during his visit to the shrines and homes of American worthies, Sir Edwin spent an agreeable sojourn, for among the literary and intellectual world of Boston the author of The Light of Asia was an honoured guest.

A visit to Walt Whitman in New Jersey deserves quotation, as a specimen of Sir Edwin’s more sober style:

“ Soon he descended the stairs, clad in a light holland coat, with open shirt ruffled in the neck, walking very lamely with the help of a stick, but certainly one of the most beautiful old men ever beheld, with his clear, keen eyes, sculptured profile, flowing silver hair and beard, and mien of lofty content and independence. . . . I told him how he was honoured and comprehended by many and many an Englishman, who knew how to distinguish great work from little, in ancient and modern tongues. The handsome youth fetched down the Leaves of Grass from upstairs, and we read together some of the lines most in mind, the book lying upon the old poet’s knee, his large and shapely hand resting in mine. The sweet-voiced woman dropped her darning needle to join in the lyrical and amicable chat; a big setter laid his soft muzzle on the master’s arm, and the afternoon grew to evening in pleasant interchange of thoughts and feelings.”

A pretty picture, the Poet of Buddha and the Poet of Drum Taps meeting under an American roof-tree to foregather in sympathetic talk.

Sir Edwin’s experience of American travel must have been extremely fortunate, for he says he accomplished the journey across the continent in five days without fatigue or discomfort. To the ordinary traveller this is a hard saying. The ingenuity of man has invented and placed in American cars an arrangement of seats called a section. At night, by shifting and pulling, the seats and their backs form a bed. In front are hung heavy curtains; above this pew a part of the roof is let down to make the upper berth. The space below is then about 4 feet high by 6 feet long by 3 feet 6 inches wide, and in that space you must undress and sleep. I affirm that for an ordinary sized man to strip himself while lying down in so small a cubic space, is a gymnastic exercise of great danger; but even when that is accomplished, the want of air, the closeness of the curtains, and the frowsiness of the cars murder sleep. If the double windows are opened, in itself a difficult task, the fine impalpable dust and the cinders from the engine cover you thickly in a few minutes. You may, and in fact do, get accustomed to the rocking motion and the jarring of the train caused by the badly laid permanent way, but the night brings anguish and discomfort to most travellers.

The story of the year in Japan occupies from chapter xii. to the end of the book, and a more appreciative sketch of Japan and the Japanese I have not before read. Every page seems to sparkle with delight at the cheery, gay little people, at their dainty ways and picturesque home life. From the first Sir Edwin fell a willing victim to the charms of the Musumô, the Japanese handmaiden, the little waitress whose pretty courtesies and willing service lighten the tiresome sequence of courses in a dinner lasting sometimes for five hours.

Throughout the succeeding chapters, when at home at Azabu, when describing the daily life, the Japanese hearth, Saké, and tea, the little maid is always foremost in the author's thoughts. She flits through the page with flowered kimono and dazzling obi, now kneeling at your feet, now prettily prostrate, now falling on her knees and knocking her nice little flat nose on the floor, or chattering a good-bye and good wishes as she hands her honourable guest to the door. She does play a great part in the pleasure of living in the East; but Sir Edwin was fortunate enough never to meet the handmaidens whose natural good manners has been corrupted by intercourse with the coarser Western life, and whose importunity and inquisitiveness have become near akin to impudence.

Sir Edwin intermingled with the best and highest of Japanese society; he enjoyed the intimacy of the foremost scholars and statesmen of the country; he had the great privilege of attending an afternoon party given by the Mikado; he was present at the opening of the new parliament by the Emperor in person; he lectured before the Japanese Educational Society; is it then wonderful that in these gay and chatty letters life in Japan should be all sunshine, the women sweetly submissive but always charming, the men artistic, resourceful, and patient, and the land the land of the lotus, the lily, the chrysanthemum? The chapter on Japan and Foreign Powers and on Treaty revision from a Japanese point of view, will repay perusal; but there is much to be said on the other side by the foreign merchant.

No work on Japan is complete without some account of her arts, and Sir Edwin devotes an interesting chapter to that subject. All who have seen or studied Japanese works of art must agree that for taste, colour, the grotesque, the humorous, the minute, the Eastern artist is surpassed by no other nation and rarely equalled. Every traveller passes through the same stage of development: first the scoffer, next the collector, and then the authority, and the last phase is the worst. From the purchase of one single netsuke, one bearing the maker's name and signature and that has been actually worn, you grow insensibly into the collector; the one becomes fifty, the fifty a hundred; and before you leave the shores of Japan boxes and boxes of ivory carvings, of screens, of Kakimonos, of sword guards, of Cloisonné, of Satsuma by Meizan, of grotesque wooden figures, lie piled up to be sent home by the P. and O. Company.

Twice only in his year's sojourn did the author feel slight shocks of an earthquake, but the recent news from Japan shows what a real and ever impending danger hangs over that earthly Paradise. When you walk over the burning sulphur-springs past O Jigoku, "The Great Hell," on the way to Hakoné from Miyanoshta, the nearness of the danger of a mighty explosion forces itself upon you. A friend of mine, a great authority on geology, told me, as the result of a tour of inspection of the volcanoes of Japan, that he had come to three conclusions. Firstly, that if anything happened to O Shima, the safety valve of the South East, the coast line would be frightfully shaken; secondly, that the place we were walking over would certainly one day blow up; and thirdly, that the newly-formed lake at Bandai san would at some time or other force its way headlong to the sea. His prophecies have unhappily come true in part; though I know not whether O Shima, the little island off Yokohama, had ought to do with the recent catastrophe, or whether "Fuji san did but heave her flanks and utter the sigh of a sleeping mountain goddess."

I have one fault to find with the author. He has not chosen the prettiest story from Mr. Mitford's classic Tales of Old Japan. Gompachi was but a swashbuckler, and Ko Murasaki not the most estimable of lady loves. He might have given us "How the Hatamoto loved the Eta Maiden," or the tale of the Barber Foxes.

On the whole, however, I can say that I have not found a dull page in the book. Sir Edwin is at his brightest and gayest when chatting with the little Musumô, or writing sonnets from the top of Fuji to the eyes of O Yoshi San, or at home at Azabu, or describing the soft solemnity of the filling of the little cup of tea. But the book is delightful from beginning to end, and must inspire in the heart a yearning to spend one year in Arcadia.

"GREAT WRITERS."—Life of Miguel de Cervantes. By Henry Edward Watts. (Walter Scott.)

MR. WATTS has done real service to the public in re-writing on a smaller scale, and in a more popular shape, that Life of Cervantes which forms the first volume of his noble translation of Don Quixote. Of Lives of Cervantes in English, of some kind or other, there are plenty; but they are of very various merit. Some are mere translations, or résumés, of the biography prefixed to foreign editions of his works; others have been written almost wholly from French or German sources, and make us suspect that their authors knew not one word of the language which Cervantes spoke. Of late years this has been changed: Duffield and Gibson, a most unequal pair, led the way to better things; Mr. Ormsby followed; and Mr. Watts closes the list of those who have written, and written well, on Cervantes and his works.

Like others, and notably like Mr. Gibson, who began with the study of Cervantes' writings, Mr. Watts has passed from appreciation of the writer to enthusiastic admiration for the man. And, indeed, it is difficult to resist the attraction of Cervantes' character: we cannot help being indulgent to his frailties. He is so free from cant and from all hypocrisy, his tolerance is so wide, his wit so quick and keen, yet with a humour so kindly as to sympathise with all, and to find something to admire almost everywhere; his high and cheerful courage, never depressed by the ill fortune which would have crushed almost every other man, his delight in deeds of daring, his lofty patriotism, his chivalrous feeling and deep respect for women of every nation, religion, or rank in life. His keen perception of the mischiefs of the exaggeration, and the noxious folly, of the romances of chivalry did not make Cervantes lose sight of, or decry for one moment, what was really true and noble in the ideal of chivalry. He has the most thorough-going common sense, joined with an equal appreciation of all that is beautiful and exalted in poetry and in literature.

Mr. Watts has well depicted this, and has also given us full details and criticisms of all his writings. This book should be for the general reader the Life of Cervantes. We have little criticism to offer. On p. 38 the conduct of Philip II. towards the Moors of Algiers, and the Moriscos in Spain, may perhaps be explained, as by Danvila (La Expulsion de los Moriscos Españoles, p. 156 seq., Madrid, 1889), by the fact that Philip's detestation of Protestant heresy had so pre-occupied his mind as to exclude any very active hatred of the Moors. On pp. 43, 44, enough is hardly allowed for the usual exaggeration of testimonials of all kinds, and especially for Spanish exaggeration; still the bare facts do sufficient honour to Cervantes. We cannot agree with the censure of the inclusion of Avellaneda's El Quijote in Rivadeneyra's "Biblioteca de Autores Españoles." This apocryphal history is necessary to every student of Spanish literature, if only for a full comprehension of the second part of the genuine history.

These are very trifling matters; if we should make any sharper stricture, it would be only on the slightly too antagonistic tone towards Mr. Ormsby. Mr. Watts gives full and merited praise to Mr. Gibson's labours; but if we, like others, prefer his own translation of Don Quixote to that of Mr. Ormsby, it is always with the feeling that there might be two opinions on the subject. This is all we should wish altered.

It remains only to say that the book has an excellent index, and a most useful bibliography of editions, biographies, criticisms, and articles in the chief languages of Europe. It is extensive—exhaustive it cannot be, any more than a like bibliography of Shakspeare could be exhaustive. But nearly every reader will be grateful for it, in so small a compass: it will make him lay down the book with additional feelings of thankfulness to Mr. Watts, and he will keep it with greater care upon his shelves for future reference.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

Ten Years of Upper Canada in Peace and War, 1805-1815; being the Ridout Letters, with Annotations, by Matilda Edgar; also an Appendix of the Narrative of the Captivity among the Shawanese Indians, in 1788, of Thos. Ridout, afterwards Surveyor-General of Upper Canada; and a Vocabulary compiled by him of the Shawanese Language. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS contribution to the history of the first two decades of the century now drawing to a close is of Canadian birth; the type, plates, and maps betray it, though, with the exception of the latter—which are very rough—the Dominion has no reason to be ashamed of its latest literary output.

Thomas Ridout, to whom or by whom most of the letters were written, was in his day a considerable personage in Upper Canada, and his numerous descendants still play a leading part in the province of Ontario. A native of Dorsetshire, he went to Maryland in 1774, where his brother had settled in the old colonial times. The story of the Revolution, which he was in the thick of, forms an interesting portion of Mr. Ridout's reminiscences. Tea riots were in full swing when he arrived, the obnoxious duty being still unrepealed; and for ten years the brothers, who were engaged in trade with the West Indies and France, shipped their goods at the imminent risk of having them seized by the privateers which swarmed everywhere. In 1787 a still more remarkable adventure befel the younger of the two. Provided with letters from General Washington—and it appears from the facsimile of one of them that the First Gentleman of Virginia, like many other gentlemen, spelt indifferently—he set out on a journey to what were then the Far Western settlements of Kentucky. On the way, however, he and his party were captured by the Shawanese Indians of the Ohio; and though most of his companions were burnt or beaten to death, his life was spared, mainly, it is believed, owing to the letter from Washington which he carried. After a detention of four months among the savages, he was brought to Detroit, then an English garrison, and, returning to Canada, finally settled at Toronto, a town then known as York. Beginning life afresh in the Commissariat Department, he filled numerous offices of honour and trust up to the date of his death in the year 1829. His sons were equally honoured by their country. Two of them served in the war of 1812 with the United States, and one, Thomas Gibbs Ridout, died in Toronto within the memory of the present writer.

It is the early, the almost schoolboy, letters of that gentleman which form the chief materials of interest in Mrs. Edgar's volume. For though she seems to place more moment upon her father's notes on the campaigns of the period when Canada was a battle field, and the whole land from St. Clair to Quebec in peril, readers—on this side of the Atlantic, at all events—will turn with more curiosity to the curious glimpses of English life in 1811, when Thomas Gibbs Ridout visited the "old country" in the hope of eventually settling here. The war letters require local knowledge; and even then we fear only the Dominion-born will regard Stoney Creek and Lundy's Lane as possessed of "a deeper significance than the contemporary triumphs of Salamanca and Waterloo." For the young Canadian was in London in the days of the Regency, when Napoleon ruled Europe and Wellington was reaping the laurels of the Peninsula, when Mrs. Siddons was still the Queen of Tragedy and Byron a familiar figure in Albemarle Street. Now and then, we light, in the letters of the Toronto lad, upon the names of the great folks of the time. He was at Vauxhall when the Gardens were lighted up "with ten thousand additional lamps" in honour of the Duke of Clarence's birthday, and, as likely as not, Jos Sedley and William Dobbin were there also. The little Princess Charlotte was among the "much good company" whom he saw in Kensington Gardens one Sunday afternoon; and, to the youth whose horizon had hitherto been bounded by a Canadian town, the Lord Mayor's Show and a Mansion House ball seemed like glimpses of Fairyland. We are told, too—for the boy was keenly intelligent—of the famine and distress which came in the train of those famous victories which were being won almost weekly beyond the seas, of the Continental Decrees by which Napoleon ought to starve England into neutrality, and of the scarcely-smothered discontent at the ministry of the day, whose policy the people thought had caused all the trouble. It was a great thing in those times to have crossed the Atlantic without a convoy, as the elder Ridout did in 1809, and on the way from Plymouth to London to have escaped the press-gang as young Ridout narrowly did, perhaps owing to his colonial "clothes and boots" being of so very different a cut from those of fashionable England. Passing Exeter Change, he heard the wild beasts roaring, and notes—in 1811—that

"the king is very ill, and is expected to die every day. There are six of Dr. Willis's men who are appointed to beat him, but they are not allowed to see anyone. He is entirely deranged, and talked the other day for twenty-two hours without ceasing."

The Prince Regent, he adds, "is in great favour with the people," though by-and-by the Toronto family circle is informed that the First Gentleman in Europe was more than "half a fool." Lord Grosvenor in that year had, in company "with another nobleman and several gentlemen," to fly for his life, "being connected with the infamous Vere Street gang."

"Three men were hung at Newgate yesterday morning; every day two or three robbers or forgers are taken up. One of the clerks of the Bank of England was hung the other day for forgery. Henry Boulton has lost his watch already."

Brandy was from forty-five to fifty shillings per gallon, and at the sale rooms not one lot in six could be disposed of, while even smuggling (which "Boney" punished with death) had ceased. The elder Ridout was, before the American Revolution ended, a warm loyalist, though his introductions from Washington and "Light Horse Harry"—General Robert Lee's father—with similar courtesies from Lafayette, show that he was, at least earlier in life, not regarded as a "Tory." But his sons were always strong Canadians.

"The French privateers now dash by dozens into every fleet, and make prizes in sight of the farmers of England. The other day a company of twenty actors, who sailed from Barbadoes, were taken off Scilly, and came into France, which afforded a laugh here. This afternoon, as I passed the Mansion House, a great mob was collected... reading two bills posted up, giving an account of the capture of the Batavia and Java, with the number of French killed and prisoners."

Yet the "Corsican Usurper's" new crown was made in London, "and the jewels set by a famous goldsmith in Ludgate-hill." At Woolwich he is introduced to some famous military engineers, and he notices convicts chained to the wheelbarrows, prison ships, sheer hulks, and tenders in the river. At Bruton, Mr. Ridout walks round the tomb of Alexander Selkirk, though he was misinformed that this wayward mariner was a native of that town: he was born at Largo, where his relatives still reside. At Fonthill, he tells his father, "not a gentleman in England" will visit Mr. Beckford, "on account of his crimes, although he is one of the cleverest and most learned men in the country. Neither will he allow a stranger to see his abbey, and he amuses himself by driving a coach and six over his grounds." In 1812 Bath was in its glory:

"Crowds of ladies and gentlemen were lounging through the streets; some were invalids, rolled upon little waggons; some flying in sedan chairs, up and down, to and fro. The gentlemen dressed in breeches, stockings, and cocked hats; the ladies in the most superb manner—pelisses laced with gold cords and hussar's hats, having three circles of gold cord round them, with two great tassels of gold upon the left side; what is called a reticule, which contains their pocket handkerchief and work, is hanging by a gold chain to the arm, and is fringed with gold."

On the road he passed crowds of French prisoners, very ragged, very dirty, and very cheerful. The latter characteristic seems also to have been applicable to the Englishmen detained in France. At Verdun their extravagances had raised the price of everything.

"They have balls, feasts, horse-racing, and hunting within their limits, building villas and laying out gardens, to the admiration of the French, who respect John Bull above all other prisoners."

Before leaving London, Mr. Ridout saw Bellingham executed at Newgate for the murder of Mr. Percival, "and his body afterwards at the dissecting-room, Bartholomew's Hospital." Bellingham is described as "a great tall, raw-boned fellow, and dressed like a gentleman. He walked with a quick and firm step upon the platform. On his appearance the immense mob, which extended from Fleet-street into Smithfield and the streets leading thereto, took their hats off and gave a great shout, crying out 'God bless you.' Every precaution had been taken against a rescue. He looked quickly round him, when two men pulled a muslin cap over his face and tied his eyes round with his neckcloth. He prayed about a minute, and as St. Sepulchre's tolled eight he sank down in the midst of the shouts of thousands and tens of thousands, who cried 'God bless you.' Every man had his hat off."

This sympathy of a mob with an assassin, simply because his victim was one of an unpopular ministry, seems the echo of a far away time: yet Mr. Percival's daughter died only a few weeks ago. A more interesting person is the Princess Charlotte.

"She is not handsome, nor tall, but looks a good deal like her father and the old king. Her mother, the Princess of Wales, drove past a little while after in a coach and four. She is a great fat Dutch woman."

We have left little space in which to criticise Mrs. Edgar's commentary on the war which began in 1812. But this is less novel, and, to anyone but a Canadian, less interesting, than the earlier and later portions of her book. One statement is, however, worth noticing. This is, that General Smythe offered a reward of forty dollars for each Indian scalp, and threatened death to every Canadian found fighting beside a savage warrior—though it does not appear that this piece of truculence was ever carried into effect.

This, and a host of similar notes, might be culled from Mrs. Edgar's useful volume, which is a veritable contribution not only to Canadian history but to the social manners of the years over which the Ridout Letters extend. If there are many such batches of old Canadian correspondence extant, we trust that the deserved success of the present instalment may induce the owners to give them a wider circulation.

A King of Tyre. By James M. Ludlow. (Osgood, MacIlvaine & Co.)

Fourteen to One. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. (Cassell.)

THE materials which Mr. Grant Allen has brought together in Dumaresq's Daughter are so entirely to his own liking that they cannot be otherwise than agreeable to his readers. He likes to give play to his dislikes; he delights in inconsistencies; and nothing is pleasanter to him than to make his characters talk or illustrate his pet theories. What in most men are weaknesses are perhaps points of strength in Mr. Grant Allen; and though one may not personally sympathise with his foibles, one would not for the world have him abandon them. Girton exists to provide him on all convenient occasions with a ready-made bête noir. Here is a Girton girl whom he has deliberately introduced by way of foil to the natural charms, the instinctive grace, the home-bred accomplishments of a delicate pink-and-white beauty whom he calls Psyche. With classic appropriateness the Girton girl is named Ida. Her husband, poor man, is "only a painter"; and when she "got upon a priori and a posteriori," he "knew his place too well to answer her back in the same dialect." But Psyche, country-bred though she was, had a spirit which refused to be snubbed by Girtonian flippancy. One day, indeed, after a small passage of arms with Ida, she thought to herself: "The worst of this cut-and-dried modern higher education is that it educates women beyond their natural powers, and tries to raise them into planes of thought for which nature and descent have never equipped them beforehand." But "the worst of" this little speech, which Psyche thought to herself, is that it is as grandiloquently flippant as anything that Girton was ever responsible for. Psyche, in fact, though she had not been to Girton, and though her cheeks still bore the peach-bloom of a healthy rustic life, was a very learned young person. And naturally so, for she was Haviland Dumaresq's daughter, and Haviland Dumaresq was the world-renowned author of The Encyclopaedic Philosophy. Mr. Grant Allen is fond of encyclopaedic philosophers, but in this instance he has taken a mischievous delight in showing that high philosophy and low sordidness are not wholly incompatible things. He intends to impress his readers with admiring awe of the great philosopher; but most of them will probably agree with Ida Mansel, who, "Girton-bred as she was, yet believed by long experience it was possible to have too much of poor dear old Dumaresq." Psyche inherits her father's force of character, without his sordidness. She could and did keep a promise that she made to him, though it all but broke her heart, and drove her lover to what seemed his death. But not all her father's authority could exact more from her than the bare fulfilment. She was her lover's all the time, and her constancy was finely vindicated in the end. Meanwhile the poor stupid lover, who, if he had not been as ridiculously blind as such men generally are, would never have doubted Psyche's complete devotion, went out to Khartoum, and got shut in there with Gordon. How he was killed and not killed, how he escaped from the perils of massacre to encounter those of the desert, the reader must find out for himself. These episodes in the plot, though at first they have the appearance of padding, are vigorous and striking. So, too, are the last scenes, which are laid in Algiers, and in which a family of Americans are brought into the story. It is a way of Mr. Grant Allen's to prepare you for liking people very much by making you dislike them extremely. These Americans are positively odious, but by degrees they win their way into your affections; and when at last they glide with everybody else out of the book, you miss them even more than you do the hero and heroine whose fortunes you have been following. But there are no superfluous people in the story. All the characters have necessary parts and fill them well—inso-much that one will want to renew one's acquaintance with them by a second reading.

The notice on the title-page of Godiva Durlough, that it is "a novel for girls," seems to remove it from the category of regulation three-volumes. Nor does it belong to that category, though the story would perhaps be more life-like and readable if it did. The aim of the book is excellent, but there is an amount of exaggeration about it which makes it inartistic. The bad people are too bad; the mean are too mean; the good are a little too plausibly good. One is less incredulous, however, of the virtues exemplified in the story than of their opposites. It is to be hoped that Hugh Durlough's daughters are not drawn from any actual type of modern young woman. Miss Doudney is too experienced a writer to fail in giving interest to what she writes. The love passages are told with a good deal of skill, and sympathetic readers will find plenty of excitement in the ups and downs of which they consist. The two old-lady aunts, and their old-fashioned garden, are very pleasantly described, and there are other parts of the story which have a merit of their own. It should be acknowledged, too, that the influence of the book cannot be anything but a wholesome one.

Wholesome in influence, touching by its pathos, and noteworthy for other reasons is Miss Benson's At Sundry Times and in Divers Manners. The tale is the work of a writer who, if she had lived, would undoubtedly have produced novels of greater mark. The affecting memoir which is prefixed to the story presents a character in which great gifts were allied with high virtues. Young as she was, Miss Benson had acquired the power of understanding and analysing character. Her knowledge of the habits and lives of the really poor could only have been obtained by close contact with them. Her people are living specimens of their class. They talk after their own manner, and their lives and surroundings are as real in Miss Benson's pages as out of them. There are marks of inexperience in some of the details of plot and construction; but there is so much good sense and sound judgment, and the pathos and humour are so real, that, while the book seems a promise of much that cannot now be attained, it is of itself a performance to be esteemed.

After Touch of Wedded Hands is undoubtedly clever, but it is also sad; and one almost recoils from so prolonged a struggle between orthodoxy and heterodoxy, between love and no love, as the story contains. Husband and wife marry, with the declaration on her part that she does not love her affianced husband, but is willing to carry out an implied obligation; with the hope on his that all will come right after marriage. But after marriage the relations between them grow colder and more divided. The wife has no religious belief; the husband is a devout minister of the Scotch Church; and their differences on what he feels to be vital questions aggravate the domestic position. Ultimately they separate. Then the wife has an illness; the husband goes to see her; and the inevitable reconciliation comes about. For the purposes of the story it is necessary that it should, but one feels that the wife's capitulation to her husband's theology is in some degree the result of her bodily weakness. They had both grown wiser, however, and he had grown broader, and—what was of more consequence to their happiness—they found that they were each dear and necessary to the other.

Biblical and semi-biblical stories are seldom effective, because it is extremely difficult to make them seem real. There is no lack of actuality, however, about A King of Tyre. King Hiram, Mr. Ludlow's hero, bears an historic name, and if it were not that history knows of no King Hiram so enlightened as he in the fifth century B.C., there is nothing in the book which the credulous reader might not accept as true. As a romance, it has almost every quality that gives charm to a story. It is picturesque from beginning to end. There are many exciting incidents in it, including escapes from fire, water, and pursuit; while the grotesque worship of Baal makes a very striking feature. Of love-making there is much, and the damsels are of the queenly Phœnician type, which almost united what was best in the Syrian and the Greek. The reader has, therefore, a good treat before him in this very pleasant book.

The author of Fourteen to One could hardly produce an uninteresting story if she tried. Here there are fourteen short tales, the first of which gives its name to the volume, and all of them are marked by the extraordinary skill in portraiture and description which characterises this writer's works.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY.

British Edible Fungi: How to Distinguish and How to Cook Them. By M. C. Cooke. (Kegan Paul & Co.) A popular and reliable handbook for fungus-eaters has long been a desideratum. Many attempts have been made to supply the demand; but they have all had so many shortcomings that they inspired little faith, and brought no peace. At last our highest living authority on fungi has turned his pen and pencil, which he wields with rare skill, to the desired end; and it is a pleasure to welcome his successful effort. The book ought to be in the possession of every one who cares about its subject. The study of fungi involves the remembrance of so many uncouth Latin names, that many people are deterred from pursuing it from this simple cause, although, to the expert, the exertion is a trivial one. Dr. Cooke has removed much of this reproach by a very successful introduction of English names wherever this could be accomplished in an unstrained way. By his choice in this direction, indeed, he shows how competent he is to guide the uninitiated in his favourite study. Others have made a similar effort and have failed disastrously. He combines the accuracy of a scientific writer with the lucidity of the popular exponent in a high degree. Any careful student of the present book might easily find, in any country place, an astonishing number of common fungi which he can cook and eat with relish, as well as with impunity. Dr. Cooke describes in untechnical language nearly a hundred species of esculent fungi, most of them common within sight of our doors—unless we live in a town; and on his twelve picturesquely coloured plates he gives us exquisite and accurate figures of no less than forty-four of the most estimable kinds. A list at the end of the book enumerates nearly two hundred British fungi which he knows to be good for food. His countless receipts, given under each species, would have exhausted the ingenuity of a Soyer. And yet, to supplement them, a whole chapter is devoted to the making of mushroom ketchup, as well as another to drying fungi for winter use. The few fungi known to be poisonous are not described, for excellent reasons given. All cases, however, of possible confusion, through false identification, are carefully noted. Furthermore, like the wise botanist he is, Dr. Cooke shows clearly how it is that there can be no rule of thumb by which edible fungi can be distinguished from poisonous or even from suspected species. It is not safe to experiment upon any fungus gastronomically unless you can make yourself sure of its identity and familiar with its characteristics. His remarks on this point are particularly worthy of notice; he is no advocate of recklessness. The hints on fungus-hunting show the skill of a past-master in the art. Indeed, the book is to be recommended in every respect; it will be long before a rival supersedes it. The plates alone are well worth the three half-crowns at which the publishers value their production.

The Birds of our Rambles. By Charles Dixon. (Chapman & Hall.) This book does not differ much, save in arrangement, from several others written by that enthusiastic bird-lover, Mr. Dixon. It purports to be "a handy book about British birds," so arranged that they may readily be identified in their ordinary haunts. A chapter is devoted to the different rambles which a student of birds may take; and the remainder perform the duty of mentor to him on the moors or Highland mountains, on the lawn or in the shrubberies, by the shore or at the homestead, and the like. Of course, this device involves some cross-division; the distribution of birds cannot be laid down with exact boundaries, so that the author is occasionally hampered. He might have bethought himself of an index, which would form a very useful addition. Marginal notes give more particular information on each bird's locality; and at the end of each chapter is a brief summary of the species described in it, giving the particular colours and the call or alarm notes. This is, perhaps, the least satisfactory feature of the book. Thus, the bullfinch's note is expressed as a "clear piping du," while the nightingale's is "a plaintive weet; alarm note, harsh croak." Not much romance is left to the Attic bird by this method of transliterating its notes. The illustrations of Mr. Elmes are disappointing. We dare not say more, as Mr. Dixon resents "the supremely ignorant remark of a still more supremely ignorant reviewer" of a former book of his, and is very wrath at the "arrant nonsense" of another "stay-at-home-know-everything critic."

Mayhew's Illustrated Horse Doctor. Revised and improved by James J. Lupton. (Griffith, Farran & Co.) No nervous master of horses should consult this book; for its four hundred illustrations represent the equine frame as racked, contorted, deformed, convulsed, and agonised with every form of disease to which the horse is liable. Such an one will undoubtedly imagine, should one of his horses be out of health, that it is suffering from some or many of these direful maladies. On the other hand, every sensible owner of a horse will be thankful for this portly volume. It details the symptoms of each disease succinctly (the above-mentioned plates are to aid in its identification), and gives the mode of treatment, together with the medicines to be used. A most commendable feature of the book is that it invariably recommends the gentlest and kindest treatment. Deserved contempt is poured on ignorant, unfeeling grooms; and the folly of trusting them to manage horses if seriously ailing is pointed out. The book is invaluable for every dweller in the country or the colonies. It does not profess, like some manuals, to teach every man to be his own infallible horse-doctor; but it does put him in the way of finding out what is amiss with his animal, and what treatment is required. In any anxious or doubtful case it very sensibly enjoins the services of the veterinary surgeon. All that was antiquated in Mayhew's edition is here eliminated and replaced by modern remedies. Firing and blood-letting, the nostrums of our fathers, are condemned; while all the resources of sanitary science, the use of anaesthetics, and the need of kindness and humanity to keep a horse cheerful and in good health are earnestly recommended. It is superfluous to praise so useful a manual, written in such a kindly spirit.

Poultry Keeping as an Industry for Farmers and Cottagers. By E. Brown. (Fanciers' Gazette Office.) While cordially accepting the undoubted fact that poultry-farms pure and simple cannot be made to pay, the object of this book is to show that for cottagers and farmers poultry-keeping as a subsidiary industry is a source of considerable profit. By selecting a good kind of fowl, with personal supervision and a watchful eye on what the market demands, success is to be achieved. The Minorca breed is shown to be the best for egg-laying, and fresh eggs are everywhere required. There are sensible chapters on the housing, feeding, and managing of fowls. To be really profitable, chickens must be hatched early in the year, and no old birds kept save for sitters. Incubators, if intelligently managed, dispense even with them. After fowls, Mr. Brown treats in a similarly common-sense fashion of turkeys, ducks, and geese. The chief varieties of poultry are well illustrated by Ludlow, and those who do not disdain to pay attention to small but certain profits will find much in this book to assist them. It contains just the information needed by the inexperienced.

Something about Guns and Shooting. By "Purple Heather." (Alexander & Shephard.) During the last sixty years various kinds of guns have been fashionable, and of these the author treats in order. Flint and steel guns (with one of which, by the way, that keen sportsman, the late Sir R. Sutton, always shot), muzzle-loaders, breech-loaders, and choke-bores, are considered, with their respective advantages and faults. "Purple Heather" sensibly advises a person buying so important a thing as a gun, always to give a good price for it. If this be fitted to his shoulder and grip by means of a "Try-gun," and a safety bolt be fitted to it, it will be the beginner's own fault should he ever miss his game, or shoot himself or his friends. It may be as well to hint to the writer of this useful manual that there are no "tigers" at the Cape, though leopards may be so called locally.

Those other Animals. By G. A. Henty. (Henry.) Although belonging to the "White-chapel Library of Wit and Humour," this little book contains no wit, and but forced attempts at humour. Some familiar animal is taken as a text for a chapter; its traits are commented on in a more or less "smart" manner, and frequently compared with human likes and dislikes. It does not appear very ludicrous to remark that a pig's upper notes are "as clear and no more unpleasant than the corresponding ones of an operatic soprano, while the lower ones would be the envy of a basso profundo." Nor is it amusing to compare geese with "the gallant corps of marines, who always distinguish themselves equally by land and sea." The style is verbose, and not seldom flippant; milk becomes, after the fashion of superfine newspaper English, "the lacteal fluid;" while being attacked by a shark is converted into "the tyrant of the sea seeking to make a man's acquaintance." Mr. Henty's fame will not be enhanced by these essays.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. E. W. B. NICHOLSON, Bodley's librarian, is about to issue, through Mr. Quaritch in London and the Clarendon Press Depository in Oxford, the first two of his "Bodleian Facsimile Series," which is to consist of faithful reproductions of some of the rarest printed works in the Bodleian. Instead of pursuing the usual course of issuing limited editions at the highest price at which a comparatively small number of people will buy, he intends to issue unlimited editions at the lowest prices which will allow a moderate profit: if they cannot be sold at a profit, he is still ready to go on with them so long as they do not involve absolute loss.

ONE of the two first issues is a photolithograph of the unique and perfect "Ars Moriendi: that is to saye the craft for to deye for the helthe of mannes sowle," printed about 1491 by either Caxton or Wynken de Worde. The original would probably sell for some hundreds of pounds: the facsimile, with a bibliographical introduction, will be published at eighteen pence. The other facsimile is a photolithograph of a remarkable historical tract, printed at Rome in 1572, the year of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day. The title is "Ordine della solennissima processione fatta dal Sommo Pontifice nell' alma citta di Roma, per la felicissima noua della destruttione della setta Vgonotana." The Bodleian copy is the only one mentioned by Brunet, or, so far as is known, by any one else; and the facsimile will be published at a shilling.

THE Cambridge University Press has nearly ready for publication a traveller's narrative written to illustrate the Episode of the Báb: Makála-i-shakhsí sayyáh ki dar kaziyya-i-Báb navishtaaft, Persian text, edited, translated and annotated, in two volumes, by Mr. Edward G. Browne, Lecturer in Persian at Cambridge. This work, composed in Persian by order of Behá' u' llah, the present chief of the Bábis, comprises a history of that sect from its origin till the present day, together with a statement of its doctrines and principles. Vol. I. contains the facsimile of the original MS.; Vol. II. gives an English translation, illustrated by numerous critical and historical notes, based for the most part on hitherto unpublished documents. The volumes will be sold separately.

THE Americans are assuredly indefatigable in bibliography. Only last week we received from Messrs. Lippincott the Supplement to Allibone, covering the years from 1850 to 1888, and consisting of two volumes of more than 1500 pages. Now we hear that Mr. R. R. Bowker, well known as the compiler of the Supplements to Leypold's American Catalogue, has undertaken to prepare an American Bibliography of the Nineteenth Century, which will give the title, with some details, of every book published in America from 1800 to 1890. Mr. Bowker stipulates for a subscription of five hundred copies, at 100 dollars (£20 each). The preliminary work will be put in hand at once; but it is estimated that, with all possible haste, the volumes can hardly be ready for issue until some years of the twentieth century have passed.

THE new volume of the "Adventure Series"—Kolokotronis: Klepht and Warrior—will be published immediately. M. Gennadius, the Greek Minister in London, has written an introduction to the translation by Mrs. Edmond.

THE series of articles on "Russian Characteristics," which have been appearing in the Fortnightly Review over the signature of E. B. Lanin, will shortly be published in a volume, with revisions, by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

The House of Cromwell: a Genealogical History of the Descendants of the Protector, by Mr. James Waylen, is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. D. J. O'DONOGHUE has sent to press the first part of a work entitled The Poets of Ireland: a Biographical Dictionary, with Bibliographical Particulars from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. This part contains over seven hundred names and a large amount of unpublished and uncollected matter. The work will be in three parts, and will contain over 2000 poets. It is published by the author himself, at 49, Little Cadogan-place, S.W.

MESSRS. GAY & BIRD announce a volume on Florence, past and present, entitled The Lily of the Arno, by Virginia W. Johnson. The work will be illustrated with twenty-five photogravures.

THE same firm have nearly ready a handsome edition of three of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes's most popular poems—the "One Hoss Shay," "How the old Horse won the Bet," and "The Broomstick Train," illustrated by Mr. Howard Pyle; and also J. R. Lowell's Sir Launfal, illustrated by Mr. E. H. Garrett, with a portrait of the author in 1842 with long curls and deep white collar.

THE new edition of Dr. Henry Van Dyke's Poetry of Tennyson, which Mr. Elkin Mathews announces to appear immediately, will contain some additional chapters, as well as an expanded "Chronology." The Laureate has himself given valuable aid in correcting various details.

MR. F. W. BOURDILLON'S poem, A Lost God, with illustrations by Mr. H. J. Ford, will be published by Mr. Mathews at the same time.

THE first number of a new sixpenny monthly, to be called the Victorian Magazine, will be issued about November 25 by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. The magazine will be illustrated, but its special purpose is to supply high-class literature. The first number will include the opening chapters of serial stories by Mrs. Oliphant and Sarah Doudney; contributions by Prof. Church, Sir Noel Paton, Ernst Pauer, Charles G. Leland, H. A. Page, Isabella Fyvie Mayo, C. F. Gordon-Cumming, Mary Brotherton; and an essay (now first published) on the French Revolution, by De Quincey. An engraving of an early portrait of the Queen will be presented with the first number.

THE first edition of Canon Driver's Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament was exhausted within six weeks of publication. A second edition is in the press, and Messrs. T. & T. Clark hope to publish it before the end of this month.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. have arranged to issue a popular edition of the Doré Don Quixote, in halfpenny weekly numbers and threepenny monthly parts. The first number will be issued on November 18, and Part I. on November 26. The work contains about 400 illustrations.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co., having recently purchased the copyright of Charles Knight's History of England, have had it brought down to the year of Her Majesty's Jubilee by the Rev. J. Sanderson, and now propose issuing it in a cheap edition.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces a popular edition of Mrs. Brightwen's Wild Nature Won by Kindness.

AT the annual festival of the Quatuor Coronati Lodge of Freemasons, held on Monday last, Mr. W. H. Rylands (secretary of the Society of Biblical Archaeology) was duly installed as Master for the ensuing twelve months. The Wardens are Dr. Wynn Westcott and the Rev. J. C. Ball; the Treasurer, who has served in that capacity from the establishment of the Lodge, is Mr. Walter Besant. The Quatuor Coronati Lodge was formed to promote the association of artists and men of letters who are members of the mystic tie; and its success has been so assured, that there are now between twelve and thirteen hundred subscribers to its printed Transactions.

THE winter season at the London Institution will be opened next Monday, November 16, at 5 p.m., with an address by Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff, entitled "Some of our Debts to the East." The Christmas course for young persons will be delivered by Prof. C. V. Boys, who has chosen for his subject "Time." Among the other arrangements are: "Ibsen and his Critics," by Mr. Edmund Gosse; "The Saga of Hamlet," by Mr. Israel Gollancz; "Spinoza, the Man and his System," by Prof. W. Knight; "Social Pictorial Satire," by Mr. G. du Maurier; "Recent Information as to the Lower Races of Man," by Dr. E. B. Tylor; "Spiders, their Work and their Wisdom," by the Rev. Dr. Dallinger; "The Spread of Commerce in Europe in Prehistoric Times," by Prof. Boyd Dawkins; "Popular Superstitions and Traditions," by Mr. G. L. Gomme; "The Tower of Babel and Confusion of Tongues," by Mr. Th. G. Pinches; "Illuminating Flames," by Prof. Vivian Lewes; and "Experimental Meteorology," by Mr. Shelford Bidwell.

DURING the first four days of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling the library of the late Dr. H. R. Luard, registry of Cambridge University. Though not including those modern first editions and illustrated books which are now so popular, the collection contains many rarities dear to a former generation of bibliophiles, and is otherwise characteristic of its deceased owner. We may specially mention the fine series of editions of the classics, from the first printed Homer (2 vols. folio, Florence, 1488), and several of the choicest Aldines, to a large paper edition of the Oxford Lucretius (1737), Wells's Xenophon, Bentley's Lucretius, and several of Gaisford's texts. There is also a copy of the rarest edition of Napier's Logarithms, many of T. Hearne's works in large paper, a complete set of the Rolls Series with autograph letters from the editors inserted, and many books of interest relating to Oxford and Cambridge.

A TALE of English country life, entitled "My Sister Cecilia," by Mr. F. T. Palgrave, was begun in the October number of a shilling magazine, the Grove, recently started at Lyme, Dorset.

THE Gloucester Journal of November 7 contains some interesting reminiscences of the late Prince L.-L. Bonaparte, contributed by Mr. John Bellows, who had been his companion in some of his dialect-hunts in the West of England.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Senate at Cambridge have adopted a report of the council, to the effect that Mr. W. J. Harvey be granted the exclusive privilege for seven years of transcribing and printing the Matriculation and Graduate Books of the University. It is Mr. Harvey's intention to apply to the several colleges for similar permission with regard to their Admission Registers, Lists of Fellows and Scholars, and to incorporate the results with those derived from the University Registers. Mr. Harvey's general scheme is of a twofold character. He proposes to print: (1) a list of all Cambridge graduates up to the year 1660; and (2) a series of volumes, one for each college separately indexed, containing the information available about every member—which seems to be practically identical with that contained in Foster's Alumni Oxonienses, except that at Cambridge there is a special entry for, "Where previously educated, under whom, and for what period." Mr. Harvey undertakes to print the work at his own expense. Though now residing in London, he is a member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland and of Ireland; and he is stated to have examined for historical purposes a very large number of Parish Registers in different parts of England. We may add that Dr. Venn, who published a few years ago the first instalment of a similar list for Gonville and Caius College, strongly supports the acceptance of Mr. Harvey's offer, and has expressed his willingness to stop his own work in the form in which it was first undertaken.

THE Cambridge University Press, following the precedent of the Clarendon Press, announces that it is prepared to take photographic negatives from MSS., printed books, &c., belonging to the University Library, or deposited there; and to supply prints—either silver, platinum, carbon, or photo-lithographed—at a certain low rate of charges.

THE Aristotelian Society will meet at Oxford on Monday next, November 16, in the common-room of Jesus College. The subject for discussion is "The Origin of the Perception of an External World"; and papers will be read by Messrs. Shadworth H. Hodgson (the president of the society), B. Bosanquet, and D. G. Ritchie—who are all, we may add, Oxford men.

MR. HUBERT HERKOMER, Slade professor of fine art at Oxford, will deliver four lectures during next week—three on "Etching," and one on "Mezzotint Engraving." The lectures will be given twice—in the morning to a general audience, and in the afternoon to members of the university only.

THE Rev. C. Pritchard, Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, is delivering a course of lectures on "The First Three Sections of Newton's Principia."

AT the meeting of the Royal Historical Society, on Thursday next, November 19, Mr. C. W. C. Oman, of All Souls' College, Oxford, will read a paper, entitled "Some Points in the Πολιτεία τῶν Ἀθηναίων."

MR. R. A. SAMPSON, of St. John's College, has been elected to an Isaac Newton studentship at Cambridge, of £200 a year, and tenable for three years. Another studentship on the same foundation will be filled up next term. It is the duty of these students to devote themselves to research in some branch of astronomy or physical optics, according to a course proposed by themselves and approved by the electors.

THE teachers' training syndicate at Cambridge has made the following appointments for the Day Training College, which has been established by a grace of the Senate, and recognised by the Education Department: director, Mr. Oscar Browning; master of method, Mr. J. W. Iliffe, head master of the Paradise-street School. We understand that the college has opened with three students.

A PORTRAIT of Dean Kitchin, by Mr. H. M. Paget, has been placed in the library of the Non-Collegiate Students' Delegacy, to commemorate his services as the first censor.

Ritae Oxonienses is the title of a book by Mr. S. F. Hulston, which Mr. Blackwell of Oxford has in the press. It deals with the battles of the nations, town and gown rows, and political riots of older Oxford; and it will be illustrated with views of buildings, now demolished, taken from Skelton's well-known work. Messrs. Methuen are the London publishers.

WE may mention here that the first number of the Educational Review contains two articles of special academical interest: "Oxford Prospects," by Mr. R. W. Macan; and "Problems of the Day at Cambridge," by Mr. Oscar Browning. Prof. Skeat also writes forcibly on "The Educational Value of English."

MR. R. W. STEWART, of Aberystwyth and Owens College, has been appointed assistant-lecturer and demonstrator in physics at the University College of North Wales, Bangor.

THE inaugural lecture delivered by Prof. Andrew Seth, on succeeding to the chair of logic and metaphysics at Edinburgh, has been published as a pamphlet (Blackwoods). The title is "The Present Position of the Philosophical Sciences." After an eloquent expression of gratitude to his predecessor, Emeritus Professor Campbell Fraser, who was among his audience, the new professor dealt with the three subjects traditionally associated with his chair—logic, psychology, and metaphysics. While giving a brief summary of the present position of each (in which special mention was made of America as well as Germany), he did not conceal his own opinions. In particular, he insisted upon the necessity, in metaphysics, of a teleological and humanistic view of the universe. Incidentally, he suggested the appointment of a lecturer or assistant-professor, specially charged with the teaching of psychology in its more recent developments. The entire lecture must be regarded, even by those who may disagree with some of the professor's views, as an admirable piece of clear and thoughtful exposition.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE INDIAN SUMMER.

BRIGHT autumn days, the dying year's last gift,
Like ripe fruit garnered up by careful hands,
O stay! nor, like impatient swallows, lift
Your wings to bear you to soft southern lands.

These fallen leaves I tread with scarce a pang,
Remembering all their kindly summer shade,
(How here the music of the thrushes rang)
Though leaves may wither, memories will not fade.

These rocks, so cold and bare to other eyes,
Are written o'er and o'er; and, as I read,
Old scenes, old friends on either hand arise,
And bid me on my onward course God speed.

For onward still through autumn days I toil,
Though storms may break on homesteads white with snow;

Though wintry Death should lay me in the soil,
My soul, a migrant bird, would heavenward go.

BEATRIX L. TOLLEMACHE.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for November opens with Prof. Sanday's first lecture on the present position of the Johannine Question. The tendency of recent criticism, more especially since Keim's Jesu von Nazara, vol. i. (1867), is set forth with admirable clearness, and the concluding words on the misleading use of the word "concessions" will commend themselves to all fair-minded students. We notice that the consideration of "partition and derivation" theories is reserved for Lecture vi.; we shall then probably get some reference to Weizsäcker's very able Untersuchungen über die evangelische Geschichte (1864), which are, no doubt, even more necessary for the due estimate of the author's later views than Prof. Sanday's early work on the Fourth Gospel (described by himself with excessive modesty) is for a comprehending judgment of his present position. Prof. McCurdy gives a useful Assyriological argument in favour of the accuracy of the Chronicler's account of Uzziah. Prof. J. T. Marshall continues on "the Aramaic Gospel." From the late Prof. Elmslie we have a striking popular lecture on Samson. Mr. Peyton discourses eloquently on the latent ideas of the account of our Lord's Third Temptation. Dr. Marcus Dods, on the Roman reckoning of the day, and Prof. Cheyne on certain critical and exegetical points, conclude the number. We have pleasure in adding that Weizsäcker's Untersuchungen mentioned above has—at last—appeared in a second edition.

THE Jewish Quarterly Review for October (David Nutt), opens with a last contribution from the unwearied pen of the late Prof. Grätz (Isaiah xxxv. is placed by him between Isaiah li., 3 and 4). Dr. Neubauer takes occasion, from Dr. Fürst's Graeco-Hebraic Glossary, to write on the non-Hebrew languages used by Jews. Dr. Kaufmann describes his very interesting discovery of the ancient English-Hebrew ritual. Dr. Chotzner gives a sketch of Immanuel de Romi, Dante's Jewish friend, already known to many readers by Dr. Paur's essay in the Dante Society's Jahrbuch. Mr. Schechter gives descriptive notes on Hebrew MSS., in the Cambridge University Library. Prof. Cheyne concludes his re-examination of the critical problems of the second part of Isaiah. Next to this paper comes Mr. Montefiore's long and friendly notice of the same scholar's Bampton Lectures. The writer specially asks the attention of Jewish readers to the three opening paragraphs of the 7th Lecture, and promises to return himself, if possible, to the great questions raised therein. Mr. J. Harris notices a French work on the Jews of Russia; Mr. Abrahams, Guttman's book on Thomas Aquinas and Judaism; and Dr. Neubauer two monographs by Epstein on Moses bad-Darshan, and an edition of a Hebrew commentary on a part of the Midrash on the Psalms. Dr. Neubauer also sends a note on Hebrew sentences in Ecclesiasticus.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for November contains an elaborate paper by Dr. Brandt on δνομα and the baptismal formula; and, among other articles, a not altogether favourable review of Prof. Max Müller's Physical Religion, by A. B.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BALLADE ADDRESSED BY EUSTACHE
 DESCHAMPS TO GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk.

This Ballade has several times been printed in England. It was originally communicated to Mr. Thomas Wright by M. Paulin Paris. By Mr. Wright it was sent to Sir Harris Nicolas, who printed it, very incorrectly and evidently without much understanding what he was printing, in his Life of Chaucer (see Aldine edition of Chaucer, vol. i., p. 82). Mr. Wright subsequently himself printed it in his Anecdota Literaria (p. 13). Mr. Henry Morley prints a portion of it in a note in his English Writers (vol. v., p. 116).

In not one of these instances is the text printed so as to be intelligible.

In France the Ballade has been thrice printed: by Tarbé (Œuvres inédites de Eustache Deschamps, vol. i., p. 123); by Sandras (Étude sur G. Chaucer, p. 261); and lastly by the late Marquis de Queux de Saint-Hilaire in the edition of Deschamps published by the Société des anciens textes français (vol. ii., p. 138). The Ballade exists, so far as is at present known, in one MS. only (No. 840 fonds français, fol. 62b-62c, in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris), which was executed after the death of Deschamps, probably before 1425. This MS., forming a huge quarto volume of nearly 300 folios with the text in double columns, has been described by Crapelet at the beginning of his edition of Deschamps (Paris, 1832), as well as by M. Paulin Paris in his Manuscrits Français (vol. vi., pp. 419-437).

This Ballade of Deschamps is of great interest from several points of view. It is not only an important testimony to Chaucer's reputation abroad during his lifetime; it also contains independent evidence of the fact that he made a translation (of the whole or part) of the Roman de la Rose—a translation which is unfortunately now lost,* though, as Prof. Skeat has more than once pointed out (see ACADEMY, September 8, 1888), various fragments of it have been preserved by Chaucer himself, owing to his fondness for borrowing from his own compositions.

* It is possible, however, that a portion of the existing English version was actually written by Chaucer. Dr. Max Kaluza has shown (see ACADEMY, July 5, 1890, p. 11), that the "Romaunt of the Rose" consists of three distinct fragments, two of which (vv. 1-1704, and vv. 5814-7694) he claims to be Chaucer's work. Prof. Skeat, however, while disposed to admit this claim as regards vv. 1-1704, is strongly of opinion that the last fragment is not by Chaucer (see ACADEMY, July 19, 1890).

So far as I am aware, there is no record of any serious attempt to get at the actual meaning of the Ballade, which happens to be the reverse of easy in places. The following attempt, therefore, may perhaps be welcome to students of Chaucer. It must be borne in mind, however, that it professes to be nothing more than an attempt, made with the object of, if possible, getting more light thrown on the subject by some one better qualified than myself.

I print the French text (with a few slight alterations) after that given by the Marquis de Queux de Saint-Hilaire, and I append a literal translation with such notes as are necessary to render it intelligible.

Ballade adressée à Geoffroy Chaucer, en lui envoyant ses ouvrages.

"O Socrates plains de philosophie,
 Seneque en meurs et Anglax en pratique,
 Ovides grans en ta poeterie,
 Bries en parler, saiges en rhetorique,
 Aigles treshaulz, qui par ta theorique
 Eulumes le regne d'Eneas,
 L'Isle aux Geans, ceuls de Bruth, et qui as Semé les fleurs et planté le rosier
 Aux ignorans de la langue Pandras,
 Grand translateur, noble Geoffroy Chaucier. 10

"Tu es d'amours mondains Dieux en Albie:
 Et de la Rose, en la terre Angeliq
 (Qui d'Angela saxonne est puis flourie
 Angleterre, d'elle ce nom s'applique
 Le derrenier en l'ethimologique),
 En bon anglès le livre translatas;
 Et un vergier ou du plant demandas
 De ceuls qui font pour eulx auctorisier,
 A ja longtemps que tu edifiâs
 Grand translateur, noble Geoffroy Chaucier. 20

"A toy, pour ce, de la fontaine Helye
 Requier avoir un buvrage autentique,
 Dont la doys est du tout en ta baillie,
 Pour rafrener d'elle ma soif ethique,
 Qui en Gaule seray paralitique
 Jusques a ce que tu m'abuveras.
 Eustaces sui, qui de mon plant aras;
 Mais pran en gré les euvres d'escolier
 Que par Clifford de moy avoir pourras,
 Grand translateur, noble Geoffroy Chaucier. 30

L'Envoy.

"Poete hault, loenge destruye (?),
 En ton jardin ne seroye qu'ortie,
 Consideré ce que j'ay dit premier,
 Ton noble plant, ta douce melodie.
 Mais pour scavoir, de rescripre te prie,
 Grant translateur, noble Geoffroy Chaucier." 36

"O Socrates, full of philosophy, Seneca in morals, and English in practice, great Ovid in thy poetry, brief in speech, wise in eloquence, most lotty eagle, who by thy philosophy dost illumine the kingdom of Aeneas, the Island of the Giants (those Brutus slew), and who hast sown the flowers and planted the rose-bush for those who are ignorant of the tongue of Pandrasus, great translator, noble Geoffroy Chaucer.

"Thou art in Albion the god of worldly love; and into good English thou didst translate the book of the Rose, in the Angelic land which from the Saxon Angela did afterwards blossom as "Angle-land" (in the etymology this name, the last, is taken from her): and long since hast thou set up an orchard, for which thou didst demand plants from those who make [i.e., are "makers," poets] in order to be considered authorities [i.e., in order to get a reputation].* great translator, &c.

"From thee therefore I require a genuine draught of the fountain of Helicon, whose source is wholly in thy keeping, in order that I therewith may abate my hetic † thirst, I who shall be palsied in Gaul until thou shalt have given me to drink. Eustace am I [that write to thee] ‡ who shalt have plants of mine: but look kindly upon the works of a scholar [i.e., tyro] which thou

† Perhaps "ethic thirst"—i.e., "thirst for philosophy."

mayest have from me by the hand of Clifford, great translator, &c.

"Lotty poet (praise not beyond thy deserts)* in thy garden I should be but a nettle, considering (as I have said before) thy noble plant, thy sweet melody. But that I may know, I pray thee write back, great translator, noble Geoffroy Chaucer."

Vv. 6, 7. These are names of Britain, taken from Wace's Brut.

8. Planté le rosier, probably a reference to Chaucer's translation of the Roman de la Rose.

9. La langue Pandras. Saint-Hilaire prints pandras; Tarbé reads apprendras, an evident shirking of the difficulty. Pandras, † or Pandrasus, was a king of Greece who held in slavery a number of exiled Trojans. When Brutus (the legendary first king of Britain), after accidentally killing his father, fled from Troy, his native land, he came to Greece, put himself at the head of the Trojan captives, and overthrew Pandrasus. He then sailed from Greece with the victorious Trojans, and eventually landed in Albion, where he founded the kingdom of Britain (see Wace, Brut, vv. 157 ff.). The language spoken by the inhabitants of Britain, of whom Chaucer is one, was first called "Trojan," then "British"—i.e., the tongue of Brutus (cf. Brut, vv. 1221-4). The language of Brutus, then, being English, the "language of Pandrasus," the foe of Brutus, must obviously be French, the language of the hereditary foes of England. Chaucer, as is well known, did translate into English portions of the works of several French authors, besides the Roman de la Rose.

12, 16. Le livre de la Rose—i.e., the Roman de la Rose.

13. This derivation of "Angleterre" from "Angela" seems to be a theory of Deschamps' own. He mentions it again elsewhere; but there is no record of "Angela" in the Brut.

18. Ceuls qui font, this exactly corresponds to Chaucer's expression, "them that make," in the so-called "Complaynt of Venus" (see ACADEMY, May 9, 1891), where he speaks of Oton de Graunson as the "flour of hem that make in Fraunce." Faiseor and faitor were both used in Old French in the sense of "maker"—i.e., poet; and Deschamps himself (in his Ballade on the death of Machant) uses faitire in that sense. Pour eulx auctorisier may perhaps mean "in order to authorise them"—i.e., you, Chaucer, have asked for "plants" from them in order thereby to give them reputation, such a request from you being in itself a title to fame. The interpretation given above, however, seems the simpler.

25. Qui, the antecedent must be supplied from ma in the previous line. There is probably intended to be a play upon the words Gaule and gole, "mouth," "throat," here.

27. Qui . . . aras, here again the antecedent must be supplied by the introduction of some such parenthesis as that given above.

29. Clifford, the name of this friend occurs again in another ballade, where Deschamps calls him "l'amoureux Clifford."

31. It is difficult to get any satisfactory sense out of the reading loenge destruye. Prof. W. P.
 Ker, to whom I am indebted for the key to the difficult passage in line 9, as well as for several other valuable hints, suggests that the true reading may be deservye. This is tame, but, at any rate, makes sense; and it only requires the alteration of a single letter of the
 MS. reading (if, indeed, destruye be such);
 Nicolas, Wright, and Sandras read destinye, which is equally unintelligible, but shows that

* Reading deservye instead of destruye, the reading of the Anciens Textes ed., which makes no sense.
 See note 31.

† In the so-called "Munich Brut" this king is always called Pandras, except in one passage (v. 607) where the form Pandrasus (used by Wace) occurs.

there was some doubt about the MS. reading) for destruye read deseruye.

33. Consideré, St.-Hilaire prints considere; the former seems to make the better sense.

I have not yet been able to obtain a collation of the original text from the MS.; it might clear up the difficulty in line 31.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

P.S.—Since the above was written, I have heard from M. Gaston Raynaud, of the Bibliothèque Nationale, that the actual MS. reading in l. 31 is undoubtedly destruye. M. Raynaud, who has undertaken to complete for the Société des Anciens Textes Françaises the edition of Deschamps commenced by the late Marquis de Queux de Saint-Hilaire, has most obligingly compared the MS. text with that of the printed edition for me. He reports that, with the exception of two trifling variations (longtemps for MS. long temps in l. 19, and seroye for MS. seroie in l. 32), the printed text is identical with that of the MS. He adds that he considers the proposed correction deseruye ought to be adopted. T.

A CORRECTION.

Trinity College, Cambridge: Nov. 8, 1891.

An Oxford friend, to whom students of these subjects are under obligations, has courteously pointed out to me that in my book, The Golden Bough, I have seriously misunderstood and mistranslated a passage in Pliny. As the passage, so misunderstood and mistranslated, is one on which I built a considerable structure of hypothesis, I hope that, in justice to the readers of The Golden Bough, you will allow me to correct my mistake in the ACADEMY, and to indicate in a few words the consequences to the main arguments of my book.

The passage in question is part of the famous one in which Pliny describes the cutting of the mistletoe by the Druids. As printed in Detlefsen's edition, which I used, it runs thus (Nat. Hist. xvi., § 250):

"Est autem id [scil. viscum] rarum admodum inventu et repertum magna religione petitur et ante omnia sexta luna, quae principia mensum annorumque his facit, et saeculi post tricesimum annum, quia jam virium abunde habeat nec sit sui dimidia."

Here, as my correspondent has pointed out to me, sexta luna means "the sixth day of the moon," as is proved by passages like Pliny (Nat. Hist. xviii., § 347), and Columella II. 10. Indeed, Pliny's own words in the present passage, quia jam virium, &c., which I had wholly misunderstood, plainly indicate that sexta luna must refer to the crescent moon. I, however, took sexta luna to mean "the sixth month," i.e., June; and as it is still a rule of folk-lore that mistletoe and other magic plants should be culled on Midsummer Eve (June 23), I inferred that the Druids also gathered the mistletoe on Midsummer Eve. In point of fact, Pliny, rightly understood, asserts no more than that the Druids cut the mistletoe by preference on the sixth day of the moon. Hence my inference that they cut it at Midsummer not only cannot be drawn from Pliny's statement, but is actually opposed to it, since the sixth day of the moon would coincide only by accident and at long intervals with Midsummer Eve. There is thus no ancient evidence whatever to show that the Druids cut the mistletoe at Midsummer. And as the supposition that they did so, combined with their human sacrifices, which there are some grounds for believing to have taken place at Midsummer, supplied the main link in the connexion which I sought to establish between the Balder myth and the rule of the Arician priesthood, it is clear that the discovery of my mistake leaves a serious breach in this part of my argument. NOTES ON HERO[N]DAS.

Trinity College, Dublin: Nov. 9, 1891.

I was unfortunately unable to see a proof of my last Notes on Herodas, or I should have corrected some misprints; I should also have omitted some conjectures which Mr. Kenyon had informed me were not consistent with the MS., and cancelled others which, I had found since forwarding my note, had been anticipated by others. The most important of these is πρωῶν, II. 80, published by Mr. Hardie some weeks since, although he did not give quite the same basis for the conjecture as I did; ἀστῆ, IV. 42, has been anticipated by Dr. Jackson; χέκρημόρους in l. 81, should be attributed to Mr. Hicks as well as Mr. Nicholson, and has been confirmed by the MS.; and νηῖν, as Mr. Kenyon's last letter tells us, is the reading of the in MS. II. 3.

"CONTENT," "CONTENTS."

We have received from Dr. Murray an interesting report upon the answers elicited by his inquiry about the accentuation of this word, which we hope to print next week. There have been received up to date exact particulars of the pronunciation of 319 persons, yielding not two only, but at least thirteen varieties of current usage as to the four test sentences. The replies also show in a most striking way that people in ordinary circumstances hear only their own pronunciation, and believe it to be that of "all educated men"; if special circumstances force another upon their attention, they are apt to set it down as American, Irish, provincial, or "half-educated."

A NEW TRANSLATION OF HAFIZ.

The Divan-i-Hafiz. Translated for the first time out of the Persian into English Prose, with Critical and Explanatory Remarks, with an Introductory Preface, a Note on Sūfi-ism, and a Life of the Author, by Lieut.-Col. H. Wilberforce Clarke. In 2 vols. (Calcutta.)

THERE is hardly any Eastern poet whose name is more familiar in Europe than Shemseddin Mohammed Hafiz, the bard of love and wine. His songs became accessible nearly two hundred years ago to the general public; but his muse has met with the most diversified explanations, as the dispute whether the sense of his verses be really full of mysticism, or whether he was inspired by the frolic nature of a man given to wordly pleasures, still remains unsettled. In the East, Hafiz very naturally enjoys far greater reputation. In Persia his Divan is not only the household companion of the better classes, but I have frequently met in caravans simple mule-drivers, who, while rattling the chain-whip to incite their heavy-loaden beasts, are wont to sing whole Ghazels out of Hafiz, which re-echoed far in the still autumnal night under the starry canopy of Southern Persia. To the Persians Hafiz is more than a poet; he is a saint who is invoked in the hour of need, and whose book is used like the Koran for the purpose of reading the future. On such occasions they open at random his Divan and piously recite the following verses:

"Ei Hafizi Shirazi
Ber men nazr endazi
Men talibi yek falem
Tu kashfi her razi."

(Oh Hafiz of Shiraz, cast one look upon me: of thee I wish to learn my future fate, for thou art the discoverer of all secrets.)

Hafiz enjoys the same veneration also among the Mohammedan nations who do not speak Persian; for his Divan is appreciated and studied, not only by the Tajiks in Central Asia, but also by the Turks in Eastern Turkestan, by the Hindustanis, and by learned Musalmans as far west as Morocco.

If, in spite of this extraordinary and widespread popularity, the Persian Anacreon cannot be understood without explanatory comment, we shall find the reason to be that Hafiz is something more than an Anacreon; for he is looked upon as the poet of the Sufi school, who presented the deeply hidden sense of mysterious allusions in the garb of voluptuous enjoyments, whose wine is the pure love of God, and whose enchanting maiden is the never fading glory of Creation. To understand him you must dive into the depths of the sea to fetch the pearl of the sublimity of sense; and it is only after perforating this precious pearl with the sharp weapon of intellect, that you will succeed in adorning your mind with the full comprehension of his Ghazels. No wonder, therefore, that many commentators have come forward to assist the reader. In Persia every age has produced its commentators; in Turkey, Sudi, Shem'i, and Sururi are reckoned the best; while among the Central Asian commentators, Abdul-Hakk of Mergulan and Shem'i of Bokhara have acquired the greatest reputations. There are even numbers of proverbs current in Mohammedan Asia which have been taken from his verses, such as: Kesra vukuf nistki endjam kiar tchist = "nobody can know the ultimate end of his doings"; Djur ez habib khushter kiz mud'ri riayet = "better the wrong of a friend than the flattery of an enemy"; Hev suhan vakti ve her nokta mekani dared = "every word has its time, and every point its place"; &c.

Of course, with us Europeans the difficulty of understanding and of fully realising the value of the poetry of Hafiz is still greater. Our mode of thinking, our views of life and its multifarious vicissitudes, our religion and ethics, are so utterly different from those of Mohammedan Orientals, that it is absolutely impossible to catch at once the meaning of a genuine Eastern poem, especially of the magnificent and highly refined verses of Hafiz, which abound in recondite play of words, in strange epithets and in significations often totally at variance with the apparent meaning of the word. Considering the hitherto published translations of Hafiz from this point of view, we can fairly say that hardly any translator—of whom Lieut.-Col. Clarke gives a nearly full list in his Preface—was capable of doing full justice to the poetical beauty of the Persian poet; for either they gave only a reflex and faint shadow of the original, or they were too literal, and so became incomprehensible. Col. Clarke has, therefore, done a useful work in combining the literal sense and the deeper—i.e., Sufistic—meaning of the Divan of Hafiz; for although partial paraphrases have already appeared in Western literature, nobody has taken the trouble to shed the necessary light over the entire Divan. Nor could this have been achieved except by a scholar thoroughly conversant with the spirit of the Persian language and with the mystic sense and secret allusions which characterise the poems of Hafiz. To accomplish this it was necessary to provide the translation with bracketed interpolations, and also with ample footnotes, which constitute more than half of the beautifully-printed and luxurious volumes before us. Allowing that some Orientalists may be found to disagree with certain of the explanations given, yet, on the whole, it must be admitted that no previous commentator on Hafiz has furnished so much valuable material for the thorough comprehension of the Divan, and that none has succeeded in presenting us with the key to that treasury of Persian literature with so much skill and grace as Col. Clarke.

It would lead too far to enter here into details concerning the accuracy of the whole translation and the sufficiency of the explanatory notes. Having before me the Turkish Commentary of Sudi, which is regarded as the best in that language, I will compare at random a Ghazel of Col. Clarke's with the translation of the Turkish scholar; and the reader will be able to judge which of the two versions is more expressive, and, at the same time, a more faithful rendering of the original. Let us take Ghazel 53.

Col. Clarke's Literal Translation.

- "1. Oh, Lord! that candle (the beloved) night illuminating (by her resplendent beauty) from the house of whom is?
Our soul has consumed. Ask ye saying:—
'She the beloved of whom is?'
- "2. Now, the upsetter of my heart and of my religion she is:
Let us see, she the fellow sleeper—of whom is; the fellow-lodger of whom is?
- "3. The ruby-wine of her lip—from my lip far be it not!
The wine of the soul of whom is? The cup-giver of the cup of whom is?
- "4. For (to win) her, every one deviseth a great spell. Yet known it is not—
Her tender heart inclined to the tale (of love), of whom is?
- "5. That ruby-wine (the beloved) that, though undrunk, has made me drunk and ruined. The associate of whom; and, the boon-companion, and the cup, of whom is?
- "6. Oh, Lord! that one, king-like, moon of face, Venus of forehead,
The inestimable pearl—of whom, and the incomparable jewel of whom is?
- "7. The fortune of society of that candle of happy ray,
Again, for God's sake, ask ye saying—
'For the moth of whom is?'
- "8. (To the beloved) I said—'Without thee, sigh (cometh) comes from the distraught heart of Hafiz.
Under the lips (covertly) laughing, she spake, saying Hafiz distraught of whom is?'

Sudi's Summary Translation.

- "1. Oh, Lord! From whose house does come that heart-enflaming candle (whose offspring is it)?
It has consumed our soul, ask ye, 'The beloved of whom is it?'
- "2. This heart-consuming candle is still destroying the house of my soul and religion.
Strange! of whom is it the fellow-sleeper and fellow-lodger?
- "3. The ruby-wine of her lips be not far from my lips
To whose soul clings her soul, under whose engagements is she obliged?
- "4. Everybody lends spell to this heart-consuming candle.
But it is not known, her tender heart to whom does incline?
- "5. [This verse is omitted in Sudi's Commentary.]
- "6. Of this Venus of forehead, moon of face, kinglike,
Who is the solitary pearl and the incomparable jewel?
- "7. The fortune of the society of this glorious splendour (light)
Ask, for God's sake, for the moth of whom is?
- "8. I said to the beloved: 'Alas! for Hafiz who is distraught in love for thee,' Smiling under her lips she said: 'Of whom is he distraught?'

The comparison of the two versions will show that Sudi, although an Oriental and writing for Orientals, recurs to more detailed paraphrases, and keeps further from the original than Col. Clarke, whose English version must seem strange and forcible to the uninitiated, but is, nevertheless, the only means of conveying an accurate idea of what Hafiz wrote and intended to express. With the aid of the present English version, it will be possible for one possessing a vena poetica to give a faithful poetical translation of the greatest lyric poet of the East; while on the other hand the student will have the best guide to the thorough understanding of the most difficult and at the same time the most beautiful poetry of Persia.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE INTRODUCTION OF BUDDHISM INTO CHINA.

Temby: Oct. 19, 1891.

After carefully weighing M. Terrien de Lacouperie's letter in the ACADEMY of October 3, and comparing it with his paper in the Babylonian and Oriental Record, it appears that there are some inconsistencies, which can only be adjusted by the rejection of the whole history of China prior to the establishment of the Han dynasty as a forgery, like the rest of the Chinese classics and early records.

M. de Lacouperie points out that there could have been no Buddhist settlement at Lintao earlier than 158 B.C., because that was the date when Buddhism was introduced into Chinese Turkestan, and because the early missionaries must have reached Lintao by that route, or by way of Thibet, where Buddhism was introduced 365 years later, for he says they could not have come by the alternative south-west route through Dachiemo (in Thibet) and Szechuan "as there was no road as yet from there." He thinks, however, that they did come by the latter route into China two years later, viz., in 219 B.C., although one would suppose that the same arguments would militate against that view. He observes that "it seems strange that they should have appeared in the north-east instead of the west or centre, and this two years at least before their arrival at Loh yang in the centre of the country." Szema tsien (Sheki K. 6, f. 13) speaks of the empire of Shehuangti extending in 221 B.C. westward as far as Lintao in the Kiang or Thibetan country; but if all this region "was hardly known and unexplored until the expedition of Chang Kien in 122 B.C.," one cannot put much faith in this.

Passing on to a statement of M. de Lacouperie's, to the effect that Tzekao was the name of the Shaman whom the emperor sent for in 219 B.C., and the reference (Sheki K. 28, f. 11) which he gives to prove it, I am sorry to say that I cannot see how the name is connected with the event at all. I translate the passage, which is a remarkable one, as follows:

"From the time of the Kings Wei and Siuen of the T'si state (378-313 B.C.) Tsou-tze's disciples argued and wrote treatises on cosmogony, and the revolution of the influences of the five ruling elements, which came to the notice of the T'sin emperor, and a man of the T'si state having addressed him in a memorial, the emperor selected and made use of some of them. Now Sung-wuki, Ch'eng-po-K'iao, Ch'ungshang, and the Shaman Tzekao, who came long after, all of whom were men of the Yen state, were skilled in the immortal path (or path of the Ilishis) divested themselves of their bodily frames, were dissolved and transformed, and relied on the worship of saints and genii. Tsou-yen presented his work on the grand revolutions of the Yin and Yang to the rulers of the states, and the priests on the sea-coasts of Yen and T'si states preached these doctrines, but they did not spread."

If it were not for the anachronism as to the date of Tsou-yen, which of course militates against the view that Buddhism entered China in 219 B.C., M. de Lacouperie would perhaps admit that the doctrines here referred to were Buddhist doctrines. He seems to hint as much, if I understand aright his observation about the passage, which is not very clear. He says (Babylonian and Oriental Record, May, 1891, p. 98):

"Szema-tsien, or the original documents he has made use of . . . refers apparently to the Nirvana, as being the principal mover of all these men's (Tsouyen, Lieh-yü-K'ou, &c.) conduct. His statement looks like a garbled notion of the mental condition of the Buddhist ascetics thus transformed into a physical fact. We have perhaps here the indication of a successful Buddhistic preaching of the Shaman Tzekao among disciples prepared somewhat to receive it by the teachings of Tsou-yen of older times."

To revert to the expedition of 219 B.C., the Sheki (K. 6, f. 18) states distinctly that it was undertaken by Hsüfu, a man of the Ts'i state, who, having memorialized the emperor to the effect that on the three sacred islands of Peng-lai, Fangchang, and Yingchow, off the Shantung coast, holy men resided, was despatched with thousands of youths and maidens to fetch them. The names of the holy men are not given, and I cannot find any evidence that either of them was called Tzekao or Lifang, nor do we find that Tzekao or Lifang were ever on the sacred isles. There seems to be some confusion about these names, for M. de Lacouperie says, "The probabilities are in favour of Tzekao and Lifang belonging to one and the same mission;" and again, "The mission was under the leadership of Tzekao and Lifang (should these two appellatives not indicate one and the same Shaman)." Again I say, "cut the Gordian knot" by rejecting the whole account.

Once more: M. de Lacouperie talks of the writings of Liehtzu, or Lieh-yü-K'ou, who is supposed to have lived about 330 B.C., and thinks this individual "may have received some information about Buddha, because his statement 'the men of the west possess a saint,' is supposed to refer to Gautama Sakyamuni."

He also observes that:

"Chinese critics, while recognising the foreign (or Buddhistic) character of some notions in Lieh-tzu's writings, were unable to understand how they could have reached China in his time, and have attributed them to later additions."

Mr. Giles (Chuangtzu, p. 423), on the other hand, says:

"It is extremely doubtful if such a man [as Liehtzu] ever lived. His record is not given by the historian Szema-t sien, and he may well have been no more than an allegorical personage created by Chuangtzu for purposes of illustration. His works supplied under the Han dynasty are generally regarded as a forgery."

One might quote Chuangtzu's work, and show the Buddhistic character of his ideas, and the numerous anachronisms it contains; but enough has been said.

I am convinced that there is no other way of explaining the numerous inconsistencies, anachronisms, and prophecies which we constantly meet with in the Chinese classics and early records than by concluding that they were written about the close of the second or the beginning of the first century B.C., after rewards were offered for the "discovery" of ancient books. This would account naturally for the hidden references to Buddhism, the names of ancient worthies corresponding with the names of people or tribes who came to the front at the time when Szema-t sien wrote his history, and many otherwise inexplicable facts, as, for instance, the great similarity between the incidents of She-huangti's supposed reign and those of the reign of Wuti of the Han dynasty (B.C. 140-87). Of course, we shall have to throw over the whole of the Chinese classics, which are full of Buddhistic ideas, and must have been written after the advent of Buddhist missionaries into China and the promulgation of their views; but this, although now opposed, must infallibly come to pass.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE following is the list of names recommended by the president and council of the Royal Society for election into the council for the year 1892, at the anniversary meeting on November 30:—president, Sir William Thomson; treasurer, John Evans; secretaries, Prof. Michael Foster and Lord Rayleigh; foreign secretary, Sir Archibald Geikie; other members of the council, Capt. William de W. Abney, William Thomas Blanford, Prof. Alexander Crum Brown, Prof. George Carey Foster, James Whitbread Lee Glaisher, Frederick Ducane Godman, John Hopkinson, Prof. George Downing Liveing, Prof. Joseph Norman Lockyer, Prof. Arthur Milnes Marshall, Dr. Philip Henry Pyc-Smith, William Chandler Roberts-Austen, Prof. Edward Albert Schäfer, Sir George Gabriel Stokes, Prof. Sydney Howard Vines, Gen. James Thomas Walker.

At the last meeting of the Linnean society a portrait of Sir John Lubbock, by Mr. Leslie Ward, was presented to the society, and ordered to be hung in their room in Burlington House. At the meeting of the same society on Thursday next, November 19, Dr. William Carruthers, of the British Museum, will read some notes on original portraits of Linnaeus, made by him during a recent visit to Sweden.

THE Christmas lectures to the young at the Royal Institution will this year be on "Life in Motion; or, the Animal Machine" (experimentally illustrated), and will be delivered by Prof. John G. McKendrick, of Glasgow.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Aristide Marre read a paper upon the names of the months among the Malagasis. In a former communication he had argued that the Malay immigration into Madagascar dates from before the introduction of Hinduism into Java and Sumatra. He now supported the same conclusion by showing that the provincial Malagasis apply to the months names different to those of Arab origin which are used by the Hovas; and that these local names belong to a peculiar calendar, analogous to that of the ancient Javanese.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, Oct. 26.)

PROF. E. C. CLARK, president, in the chair. The president, on assuming the chair, made some practical remarks on "The Methods and Means of Archaeological Study," of which the following is an abstract:—The object of our society is to encourage the study of History, Architecture, and Antiquities: and as History is the great and ultimate object, so it is the prime means of any intelligent archaeological inquiry. As a mere help to observation, it is of first-rate importance that we should know generally what to look for. Again, for understanding the different objects which we observe, and connecting them with one another, history is simply indispensable. In spite of the specialising tendency of the present day, I think that a general outline is rather what is wanted, at any rate for purposes of reference, by the archaeological student. But I want to mention a practical desideratum for the archaeologist—a good chronology. I pass to Architecture—by far the most attractive branch of archaeology. As to general literature on this subject, there are now several good handbooks. There is still needed a general statement, in a handy form, of the plan of buildings usually adopted by this or that order of monastic or other religious persons in the middle ages. Again, the working out of some possible mechanical contrivance, by which workmen call the "templet" of a series of mouldings could be rapidly taken down on paper, would be a great boon. Under the general subject of Antiquities I have one word on inscriptions. The time is past when vague settings down of the observer's interpretation can suffice. We must have each letter, each space where a letter might have been, and the relative position of each mark or blank, recorded. And here is another desideratum for the practical archaeologist. Wanted, a portable material which will adapt itself readily to the surface of an inscribed stone, which will retain the impression when detached, and become fairly rigid in a moderately short time. Casts are a matter of considerable time, and should only be made by a skilled artisan. As to the means of saving from destruction a threatened monument not yet included in General Pitt-Rivers's list, the owner should be bought or flattered—and perhaps this is best done through the intervention of the Society of Antiquaries, but not hectoring or told that he is a trustee. To avert the artistic tastes of 'Arry; when possible and proper, the removal of the monument into a church seems far the best measure. When you can only have the temple of nature, a very ingenious method was suggested to me indirectly by a recent address of the Bishop of Carlisle. Put up a new monument like the old one—but, of course, better—and 'Arry will generally expend his energies upon that. Two last practical hints:—Let no collector, private or public, even omit to record, by label, where the object comes from. Probably its whole historical value turns on the preservation of that fact. This need not be "in plain figures," but the fact should be preserved in some ascertainable private note. As to public collections, the labelling being assumed, the arrangement is everything. That we have far too little space was told you by your late president; but we shall shortly have much less, on account of the valuable bequest recently made us by Mr. Foster. Yet want of room may be in part remedied by a good catalogue, and a catalogue is now nearly completed by Baron von Hügel.—Mr. J. W. Clark read a paper on some chained libraries, of the existence of which he had become aware since he wrote his Essay on College Libraries in the Architectural History of the University and Colleges of Cambridge (vol. iii., pp. 387–471). After an introduction on the system of chaining in general, illustrated by a model, he described the following libraries. (1) At Cesena in North Italy there is a library built by Domenico Malatesta Novello in 1452. It is 139 feet long, by 35 feet broad, divided into three aisles by two rows of ten fluted columns. There are twenty-nine bookcases on each side of the room. In their general arrangement they resemble those in the Biblioteca Laurenziana at Florence, designed 73 years later by Michael Angelo; but they are much plainer. Each is about 10 feet long by 4 feet high, and 3 feet wide. All the books are chained, but on a system slightly different from that at Florence. There the bar to which the chains are attached is hidden away beneath the desk. At Cesena it is in full view, carried on massive iron rings screwed into the end of the bookcase. The bar is locked by means of a hasp attached to the middle upright, which divides the case in half. As at Florence the books, when not in use, are laid on their sides on a shelf about a foot below the desk. The chains are of an unusual form, each link (about 2½ in. long) consisting of a solid central portion with a ring at each end. The paper was illustrated with some beautiful photographs taken by Dr. Hardcastle. (2) The existence of a number of chained books in the Grammar School, Guildford, has lately been made known by Mr. G. C. Williamson. A letter addressed by him to The West Surrey Times, December 27, 1890, gives a history of the library. It was founded by John Purkhurst, Bishop of Norwich 1560–1575, who bequeathed certain books to the school. He died in 1575; but the books did not reach Guildford for some years, and the library was not arranged until 1586. The books were then chained. During the seventeenth century the library was increased by gifts from various persons, especially from Archbishop Abbott. A New Testament, printed at Paris in 1632, given by him, still bears its chain. In the course of the last century the books were little cared for, and removed from the room in which they had been placed at first. Finally the very existence of the few that remained was forgotten, until they came to light in the course of some recent alterations. A chain was exhibited. It is of hammered iron, 42 in. long, composed of 18 links, with the swivel at one end. The links are longer than those at Hereford (figured Arch. Hist. ut supra, p. 422), and the swivel quite different in design. (3) At Wells Cathedral the library occupies part of a room over the east walk of the cloister, entered by a circular staircase from the south transept. There is a tradition that it was fitted up as a library in 1472. Passages were quoted from the MS. Catalogue to show that the library was arranged as we see it now by Robert Creighton, Dean of Wells 1660—1670, and Bishop of Bath and Wells 1670—1672, with the assistance of Dr. Richard Busby and Dr. Ralph Bathurst, President of Trinity College, Oxford, who succeeded Creighton as Dean. There are eight bookcases, of plain unpainted deal, standing at right angles to the wall between the windows; and between each pair of these, under the windows, are seats of the same material. The cases have desks, and the whole apparatus for chaining is complete. They resemble exactly those in the library of Corpus Christi College, Oxford (figured Arch. Hist. ut supra, p. 413). A good many chains are lying about in the library; but the books show few signs of having ever been chained. It was suggested that the chains may belong to the library of 1472, and that Dr. Bathurst, to whom the particular type of bookcase used may be attributed, intended to have the gifts of himself and his friends chained, but that the work was never carried out.

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—The president delivered his inaugural address on "Matter." Though the present subject is "Matter" as it is understood by the plain man and the physicist, as well as by the philosopher, the treatment of it must on this occasion be philosophical, not simply scientific. If real matter is at one pole of the orbis philosophis notus, consciousness is at the other. Of the reality of matter there is no doubt, except such as may be thrown upon it by assuming the reality of mind. But without entering on this question, the reality of matter is here taken for granted, in the ordinary sense above mentioned. Approaching it from the side of consciousness, that is, from what we know of it, we find that, in the first instance, matter is a percept, something perceived, or belonging as a part to consciousness as a whole. This we may call Percept-Matter. From this we infer, by processes which cannot now be described in detail, the reality of the matter which is so perceived, that is, of real matter in the ordinary sense. Each of these two aspects of matter has its own analysis. Percept-Matter is analysable into perceptions of sight and touch, and consists of their combination. Real-Matter is analysable, in the way indicated by Newton in the definitions of the Principia, into coherent and resistant occupancy of space, involving the existence of vis insita or vis inertiae in every portion, however minute, of the space so occupied. It may accordingly be defined as adverse and active occupancy of space. Passing over one main branch of the subject—namely, matter considered as the real condition upon which consciousness depends for its existence in individuals, under which head would fall the distinction between its so-called primary and secondary qualities—we come to the great question of the genesis of matter, including those of its eternity and infinity. From the fact that we discern a duality, or plurality, of parts of space, in that space-occupancy which we call matter, we infer (1) that it requires a finite minimum, or finite minima, of space in order to exist at all; (2) that there must be some real though unknown conditions of the coherence ad intra of every one of those minima; and (3) that there was a time when no real matter existed, but only some real conditions of it, the nature of which we have no means of positively ascertaining. It may also be inferred from these and other considerations that matter is not infinite in extension, does not occupy infinite space. When we conceive it as generated, we must conceive it as generated in some particular form, since otherwise it would be an unformed hyle, not corresponding to the physicist's conception of it as a reality. On the other hand, there is nothing to show that it will not exist through infinite time, or be eternal so far as the future is concerned, always supposing that no unknown real conditions, such as those to which it owes its genesis, should operate to limit its duration.

FINE ART.

A SUMMARY OF RECENT ARCHAEOLOGICAL RESEARCH IN ANCIENT GREECE.

Chroniques d'Orient; documents sur les fouilles et découvertes dans l'Orient Hellénique. Par Salomon Reinach. (Paris: Firmin-Didot.)

ALL students of Greek antiquity should be familiar with the Chroniques which M. Reinach has, during the last eight years, contributed to the Revue Archéologique. Should anyone be unacquainted with them, he might be misled by the title of this work; he will look in vain for "Chine" in the Index between "chion" and "Chios," and he will find only one reference to Babylonia. The Chroniques deal exclusively with the Hellenic East. M. Reinach has not been content to feel and deplore the limits imposed on study by the enormous and ever increasing mass of unarranged and undigested material. He has, on the one hand, in his manuals (Manuel de Philologie Classique, 1883-4, Traité d'Épigraphie Grecque, 1885), and in his admirable Bibliothèque des Monuments Figurés, set himself the task of codifying the old material. As an author of handbooks, perhaps still more as an independent enquirer, he has felt (what those who use even the best handbooks should always feel) that they are in as constant need of revision as almanacs or directories. Frequent new editions of archaeological handbooks are unfortunately prohibited by the smallness of their circulation as compared with that of physiological or medical works. Such a work as this is the next best thing. It has been M. Reinach's chief object to give in each of the Chroniques that he here collects a summary of the published results of research in, and in regard to, every part of the Greek world. He has done all he could, and no one could have done more, to make his survey complete; and the present publication of the Chroniques for the last eight very eventful years, with an admirable index, is therefore a necessary book of reference for the classical scholar. Unless he has made a private Chronique of his own, he will not otherwise be able to keep up to date such standard works as Löwy's Inchriften der Gr. Bildhauer, Kirchhoff's Griechische Alphabet, or Reinach's own Traité d'Épigraphie. How much amendment the last would have to undergo may be seen by a reference to "Alphabet," "Décrets," "Calendrier," &c., in this index.

The Chroniques, thus viewed as a summary of published results, are distinguished from other competitors by their wide range, by many free and very welcome gifts (such as bibliographies of Greek islands, and extracts from almost unknown books of travel), and by a lively and individual presentment, wonderfully constant considering the diversity of subjects. M. Reinach, in originally starting them, had however, a different ideal in view, an ideal which may still be realised. He desired to make them a centre to which immediate reports of discoveries might be sent from all the Greek world. He had personal relations with the leading Turkish authorities in matters of antiquity, and he hoped that these relations might be developed and extended. We find here a certain amount of valuable personally communicated information—Prof. Ramsay's letters, always perhaps containing something which has not yet found its place elsewhere; numerous new inscriptions from Thasos, and some from other parts. But there is only enough to make us want more. Greece can look after itself. We have there the Greek Archaeological Society and its monthly Δελτίον, which is admirably conducted, and may be trusted, I hope, to index itself like the Roman municipal Bulletino. We have the vigilant schools of four nations. In Turkey things are widely different. The passion for antiquity which rages in Greece has infected the Turkish Greeks also. There are in every Greek island and village interested and observant persons. The progress of chance discovery goes on. But Athenian archaeologists shut their eyes to the Greece beyond the frontier, and the foreign schools in Athens have never conceived the idea of establishing an international branch in Smyrna which could sell old lamps for new. Thus much of value is inevitably lost. It is beyond the power of any one man to put himself in contact with local antiquaries all over European and Asiatic Turkey; but, nevertheless, I hope to see this feature of the Chroniques further developed. English visitors to the Turkish coasts should certainly assist by communicating to M. Reinach any information that reaches them.

One suggestion I would make. Perhaps where we receive so much it is graceless to demand more; but the geographical arrangement of the Chroniques has always appeared to me to invite a systematic (and not occasional) inclusion of numismatics. There is, I believe, no corresponding publication specially dealing with coins.

It is to be hoped that all those whose labour is lightened by this work will take to heart, and attempt to enforce, the persistent protests of its author against abuses by which his own labour and theirs are aggravated. So far as they concern the absurd laws relating to antiquities in Greece and Turkey, I fear that there are few readers who will be able to do more than echo them; but the protests against expensive publications in folio, against the publication of inscriptions, &c., in periodicals where no one would think of looking for them, are not addressed to the deaf or the impotent and should prove effectual. As regards the Asiatic terracotta groups, M. Reinach has, so far as he could, put the dots on his i's. A case containing some of them was confiscated at the Piræus: these were pronounced officially to be forgeries: the consigner was known to the authorities: they should have instituted enquiries with a view to prosecuting him. Then the air would have been cleared, and the necropolis which yields them would perhaps have been exhausted.

THE NEW CHARTER OF THE ROYAL SCOTTISH ACADEMY.

THE supplementary charter, for which the Royal Scottish Academy applied so long ago, with the view of increasing the powers conferred by the original charter of 1838, passed the Privy Council on the 24th of September last, and has now received the signature of Her Majesty and of the Secretary for Scotland.

All existing rights are scrupulously protected: but, among the fresh provisions of this charter, the following may be mentioned:—

It is enacted that all such Academicians and Associates as may hereafter be elected shall forfeit their interest in the pension fund by an unbroken residence of four years out of Scotland. Though they retain their style of R. S. A. or R. A., their places are to be supplied by fresh elections; but, in the case of their return, they are, upon the first vacancy, to be again enrolled among the participating members.

The Associates will, in the future, be unlimited in number, though only twenty of them—as formerly—may participate in the pension fund. They are to be nominated for election, instead of making written application for the honour as hitherto has been the case; and it is enacted that they shall be admitted to a specified share in the administration of the Academy.

It can hardly be doubted that the provisions above indicated are in the direction of progress and additional usefulness; and, in particular, the great increase, since the original charter was granted, in the number of artists practising in Scotland has distinctly demanded an extension of the limits of the national Academy, in order to make that body truly and comprehensively representative of every worthy phase of Scottish art.

The unlimited powers for the election of Associates now granted have, indeed, their possible dangers. They may be abused by nepotism, nay, even by the action of that mere kindness and easy good-nature which is sometimes the deadliest error. But if the Scottish Academy only remains true to its best traditions, and exercises its fresh authority with high-minded, even-handed justice—justice untempered with mercy—nothing but good can follow.

Judging from the published synopsis, the new charter is less distinct than might have been desired upon one point—viz., as to the exact proportion of annual income that is to be devoted to art instruction. We shall look to the complete text of the charter for more specific information regarding this matter.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. FÜHRER'S EXCAVATIONS AT MATHURĀ.

Muzaffarnagar, North-West Provinces, India:
Oct. 4, 1891.

On various occasions the ACADEMY has given most interesting information as to the results of Dr. Führer's exploration of the Buddhist and Jain sites at Mathurā (Muttra). His further progress is hampered by want of funds. He estimates that the small sum of Rs. 6000, or about £420, would enable him "to do Mathurā thoroughly," and appeals to me for help. May I ask you to be good enough to give me space to print the following letter?

"Lucknow Museum.

"MY DEAR MR. SMITH,
"I have finished the excavation of the Kankali Tilā at Mathurā, but there are still many others which have never been touched, or but slightly searched. For instance, the Katra mound would yield very ancient documents of the Bhāgavatas, and the Sitala ghāṭī mound ancient Jaina works, like the Kankali Tilā. The Chaubāra and Chaurāsi mounds have only been slightly excavated, and would give up many other valuable documents.

"According to my calculations, a sum of Rs. 6000 would be required to do Mathurā thoroughly within three years, each year requiring Rs. 2000

"I received the following sums from government:

1888-1889,	from Public Works Dept.	Rs. 600
1889-1890	" "	700
" "	Mathurā Municipality	250
1890-1891	" Public Works Dept.	800
" "	" Lucknow Museum
	Committee	400
		Rs. 2750

These grants were all very small: and I might have done much more, if I had had more money at my disposal.

"I think some antiquarian societies at home might be induced to contribute some small sums towards the exploration of ancient Mathurā.

"I should feel much obliged to you if you could help me in the matter.

"Yours very sincerely,

"A. FÜHRER."

If, Sir, you are willing to undertake to receive contributions, I shall have much pleasure in opening the list with a subscription of £5. I may add that I have advised the government of these provinces to concentrate its archaeological energy on Mathurā.

VINCENT A. SMITH.

THE CHESTER PIGS OF LEAD.

Oxford: Nov. 6, 1891.

I am very sorry to differ from my friend Mr. Haverfield, but I may explain that my conviction has been deliberately formed: I have looked at the pigs on two different occasions, and on the last of them I was aware that Mr. Haverfield adhered to the old reading, so that I tested his view and mine as carefully as I could. We must, therefore, agree to differ until, as he says, further evidence appears.

In my first letter I ought to have said, in reference to the visit of the Cambrians to the Grosvenor Museum, that the first to read Deceangl was Archdeacon Thomas; also that the boundaries of Tegeingl have been the subject of a learned correspondence published in the Archæologia Cambrensis. The writers were Mr. Phillimore and Mr. Edward Owen.

J. RHYS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. GEORGE O. REID, of the Royal Scottish Academy (not to be confounded with the new president), has been commissioned by the Queen to paint a memorial picture of the Baptism Ceremonial at Balmoral of the child of the Prince and Princess of Battenberg. Mr. Reid, we doubt not, is excellently qualified for the task and worthy of the honour. His faculty for composition, for the effective grouping of human figures in dramatic action, has been evinced by many little genre subjects, and found large scope in the "Voltaire" picture recently exhibited at Burlington House.

THE statement, by a contemporary, that "it is proposed to have an exhibition in Edinburgh of the works of the late Sir William Fettes Douglas," is—we believe—not strictly accurate. We understand that there is no question of an independent gathering of the works of the late president of the Royal Scottish Academy; but it is hoped that a selection of his finest productions may find a place in the annual exhibition, which will open next month, and not, as formerly, in February. Owners of paintings by the artist, important from size or quality, are invited to communicate with the secretary on the subject.

THE exhibitions to open next week are—a series of water-colour drawings by Mr. Walter W. May, entitled "On the Fjords of Norway," at Messrs. Buck & Reid's Gallery, in New Bond-street; and Mr. Mendoza's ninth annual show of work in black and white at the St. James's Gallery, King-street.

MESSRS. HOWELL & JAMES will also open next week, in Regent-street, their seventh annual exhibition of antique lace, embroideries, brocades, &c., chiefly from Spain and Italy.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Gustave Schlumberger exhibited a relic which has a curious history. It is the fragment of a left parietal bone, enclosed in a plaque of silver, which is incised with the figure and the name (in Greek letters) of Saint Akindynos, who was martyred at Nicomedia in the reign of Diocletian. In 1200, this relic was preserved at Constantinople in the church of Saints Cosmo and Damian; for it is mentioned as being there at that time by a Russian pilgrim, the archbishop of Novgorod. Four years later Constantinople was sacked by the returning crusaders, and this relic was presented to the abbey of Rosières, in the Jura. An inventory of the treasures of this abbey, made in 1714, mentions both the bone and its silver setting. In 1791, when all the treasures of the abbey were dispersed, the relic disappeared. But quite recently, the Abbé Guichard, while making some archaeological excavations at Grozon, near Rosières, found the bone of Saint Akindynos, still enclosed within its silver plaque, in a heap of wood-ashes left by some salt-workers.

THE address which Mr. William Morris delivered at the opening of the collection of Pre-Raphaelite pictures at Birmingham, on October 2, has now been published as a penny pamphlet (Birmingham: Osborne).

THE STAGE.

MELODRAMA IN HIGH PLACES.

LAST Saturday's production at the St. James's Theatre—"Lord Anerley," by Mr. H. Hamilton and the late Mr. Mark Quinton—turns out to be good, honest, unadulterated melodrama. "Good" melodrama may be produced at the Adelphi; "honest" at the Princess's; but "unadulterated," I suppose, at neither. Such is theatrical degeneracy! It has been given to Mr. George Alexander, in his capacity of actor-manager, to be bolder than they of the Princess's or they of the Adelphi. He has returned to the fashions of the ancient days—fashions, it is true, which at the Haymarket, and perhaps elsewhere, are somewhat apt to re-appear, though all the world does not readily recognise them—and he has given us a play of amazing, not to say baffling, intricacy; a play which strains our attention and perhaps our powers of belief; a play whose effects are essentially theatrical and not literary. He has himself a good part in it, and is seen to advantage; and, under these conditions, the curious may ask themselves a question which they may not find it so very easy to answer—Has the play been produced because it afforded to the young actor-manager a good opportunity; or because he imagined that from the commercial point of view it was a hopeful speculation; or because, with so much talk about "literature" at the theatre and the rights of authors to be interpreted in their own way—their all-importance, in fact—it was desirable to prove that a play might succeed in which the author's part was limited almost to the exercise of the humble function of interesting the audience in a plot, and of providing material for the benefit of the actor? Whichever of these reasons may have been the potent one—and I assume, in a measure, the existence of all three—"Lord Anerley" has been produced; a public, not particularly exacting, has applauded it; it may have a certain run. But the dialogue is not deeply interesting, and the action of the characters will not stand analysis. Melodrama, of the old and simple-minded sort, I say again—good, honest, and unadulterated—these things die hard.

Mr. Alexander himself supports the character of the hero—one Rupert Lee. He is a weak person, who is the subject of many adventures. He is very skilfully played. Mr. Nutcombe Gould acts and looks well as a somewhat aged nobleman; Mr. Arthur Bouchier is a villain of the unmistakable and uncompromising sort; Mr. B. Webster, as a youthful lover, affords the piece what is called "comic relief." Miss Marion Terry is, as usual, earnest and pathetic, as well as experienced; and Miss Kingston, as a Spanish dancer, approves herself at least a realist in art. That the players were accepted is no matter of surprise, for their performance was in all cases adequate; but that the characters they represented should have received a welcome confirms me in the possession of an optimistic faith which I have long cherished—yes, indeed, there is a good deal of naïveté still left, somewhere or other, in this London Town.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. JAMES MORTIMER'S brightly written and smartly played "Gloriana," brought out on Tuesday at the Globe, bids fair to be successful. It is a farce not dependent for its interest wholly upon boisterous action. The dialogue counts for something; and that the piece has other merits may fairly be assumed when it is remembered, not so much that it is an adaptation of MM. Chivot and Duru's "Le Truc d'Arthur," as that the successful modern production just named is itself an adaptation of a French classic—Marivaux's "Jeu de l'Amour et du Hasard." The English piece is funny, and it probably does not aim to be anything more. The audience finds it not difficult to laugh. In this process no one is of more assistance to it than Mr. Harry Paulton. Mr. Lestocq and Mr. W. H. Vernon lend excellent aid. There is a more or less comic study by Miss Cowell, and Miss Florence West plays always with a certain style and womanliness.

WE regret to hear that Miss Winifred Emery has been ordered a long rest. Miss Emery will possibly spend a portion of the winter in the Engadine. She gives up her part in the new piece at the Avenue to Miss Maud Millett, who has lately been the object of many tributes at Cambridge, and whom everyone will be glad to see again in London.

MR. DAVENPORT ADAMS'S latest little book—With Poet and Player (Elliot Stock)—is a collection, in dainty form, of many short and graceful and suggestive essays which this popular writer has furnished to the "higher," which is not necessarily the "newer," journalism. Mr. Adams is at home with many subjects

—we are sure he will not die without producing a cookery book in emulation of Mr. Theodore Child, a brother wit, and the late Mr. Dallas. A connoisseur has not said his last word—he has not, we consider, discharged his duty—until he has pronounced upon the things of the kitchen and the table, and added an opinion upon the art of the chef to an opinion upon the plastic and other minor arts. But meanwhile—during such time as the inevitable may be delayed—we are glad to receive Mr. Davenport Adams's contributions to pure literature. With Poet and Player shows not only much reading and admirable taste, but the qualities of reflectiveness and of happy expression. Indeed, our only complaint is that every essay is too short. The writer touches and does not probe. Penetration, in the truer sense, we are far from denying him, for that is obviously not so much an affair of length of treatment as of quality of vision. In that better sense, Mr. Adams does "penetrate," because he is sympathetic and understands. "Goethe in England," "English Characters," and "The Poetry of Patriotism" are subjects on which we find him at his happiest. In the present volume the stage themes, strictly speaking, are not very numerous, though the author is amusing on "The Stage Rustic," and has a suggestive paper on "Botany on the Boards." May we mention, last of all, "The Literature of Salad?" It is as fresh as that green thing—the "cos lettuce," or romaine, as the French call it—which is the best foundation for the dish of which the essay treats. This it is, perhaps, which gives us our hopes as to what Mr. Davenport Adams—who understands many subjects, and writes on them always with so pleasant and light a touch—may yet do for us in the way of an addition to the literature of la haute cuisine.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MENDELSSOHN'S pianoforte Concerto in G minor is not often heard now-a-days, and it must be confessed that it bears traces of a somewhat remote past. Mlle. Janotha, however, the interpretess, at the Crystal Palace last Saturday, was at her best, especially in the brilliant finale, and received a double recall. She also played the lively "Wedding Cake" Valse of Saint-Saëns. The programme included Mozart's delightful little romance from a serenade for strings only, and Beethoven's "Leonora" No. 1, or, as it should more properly be called, No. 3. The principal instrumental work of the afternoon was, however, Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique. The performance was a magnificent one, and at the close Mr. Manns received quite an ovation. Berlioz's Symphony, with its gorgeously painted scenes, needs a first-class rendering to produce any effect. An imperfect performance of some works half spoils them; with Berlioz, as indeed with Chopin, any shortcomings seem to present their tone-pictures in a totally false light. Miss Macintyre was much applauded for her rendering of the "Senta" Ballad, and Goring Thomas's graceful "Summer Night."

M. Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, was leader at the Monday Popular Concert. The performance of Mendelssohn's Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1) was marked by great refinement and also vigour. M. Ysaye's tone was faultless. It must be difficult for an artist of such individuality to excel as an ensemble player—to be comrade rather than king; and there was just a touch of the solo player about his reading. He was afterwards heard in Bach's Sarabande and Gigue from the Sonata in D minor, which he interpreted with purity of tone, and with emotional as well as intellectual power. He was encored. M. Schönberger played two (Nos. 6 and 7) of Schumann's "Novelletten" with great skill, though not with sufficient earnestness. The same thing was noticeable in the Schumann's "Toccatà," which he gave by way of encore: the technical difficulties seemed to overcloud the composer's soul. A pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 45), by M. Gabriel Fauré, who ranks among the prominent French musicians of the day, was heard for the first time. The opening Allegro is one of considerable interest; the thematic workings are exceedingly clever, but the music is somewhat too restless in character. The second movement, a kind of Scherzo, is lively, though dry. The Adagio is diffuse and the principal theme unsatisfactory. The composer has something to say, but the mood is not sufficiently definite. The Finale has plenty of vigour, but can scarcely be accounted attractive. Miss Fillunger sang "Elizabeth's Prayer," from "Tannhäuser," with feeling, but the middle part was too slow. Surely excerpts from Wagner's operas are out of place at these concerts: Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, are as yet far from exhausted. Miss Fillunger's second song was Schubert's "Zuleika," in which she was heard to better advantage. Mr. Frantzen was the accompanist at the piano.

Mme. Adelina Patti sang at Messrs. Harrison's concert at the Albert Hall on Friday week, and, of course, drew an immense audience. To give the list of her songs, or the names and number of her encores, would be to tell an oft told tale. The prima donna was in splendid voice, and charmed her hearers. Her continued success with the public is a remarkable phenomenon, but from a purely musical point of view is not of special interest. Some go to hear her to revive past memories, some because it is the fashion, and some because they are young and have not heard her before. No vocalist, Jenny Lind excepted, has enjoyed such popularity.

The annual performance of "The Messiah" in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians took place at Westminster Abbey on Wednesday evening, and, as usual, so good a cause and so popular an Oratorio drew a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Barton M'Guckin, Watkin Mills, and Santley; and they all sang remarkably well. Mr. Santley was in unusually good voice. The chorus was not strong, but good in some of the choruses. Dr. Bridge conducted.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE performance of "Lohengrin" at Covent Garden last Saturday evening was by no means a successful one. Mr. Scovel sent a message at the last moment to say that he could not appear, and the title-role was taken by a Canadian tenor, Mr. Hedmond; and, under the circumstances, it may easily be supposed that the Lohengrin music was not all that could be desired. Mr. Hedmond is, however, an intelligent singer. Mlle. Martin was unsympathetic as Elsa, but Mlle. de Spagni played the part of Ortrud with considerable dramatic power. The chorus, especially in the first act, was not at its best. M. Jehin conducted in an able manner.

WE have received the programme of the Westminster Orchestral Society, which is now in the seventh year of its existence. It is proposed to have three concerts during the coming season—in December, March, and May—at each of which prominence will be given to works by British composers; and at the December concert Mozart's centenary will be specially remembered.

NEW NOVELS.

BY C. R. COLERIDGE, AUTHOR OF "JACK O' LANTHORN."

AMETHYST: the Story of a Beauty. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

"Is distinctly a clever novel. The Haredale household, with the three younger sisters, who have studied the scary side of life, while Amethyst has been working at her books, is very well and amusingly drawn. The book is full of clever, quick, incisive character sketching."—Saturday Review.

"The writer can tell a story well. Told with a high degree of nervous power and remarkable temperateness as regards expression of religious views."—Academy.

"The writer's ability is manifest. Her story is cleverly managed and true to the life depicted—lightly and brightly written, and the characters are well drawn."—Anti-Jacobin.

"Amethyst herself is very charming."—Manchester Guardian.

BY MARY BATHURST DEANE, AUTHOR OF "KINSFOLK," &c.

MR. ZINZAN of BATH; or, Seen in an Old Mirror. Illustrated. 4to, 6s.

"The little sketches of Old Bath are extremely pretty and well drawn. An agreeable little tale. Dolly Chesney is a pretty, attractive figure. The book will probably become popular among the many friends and patients of 'The Bath,' and in its popularity the illustrations may claim a large share."—Saturday Review.

"The author has caught the tone of a hundred and fifty years ago so completely as to have been caught by it. The novel is no mere study of characters, but has plenty of incident grave and gay."—Anti-Jacobin.

"This is a very prettily got up and illustrated book, and it gives an excellent picture of Bath in the palmy days of Beau Nash and George II."—Guardian.

"Mary Deane's delightful novel."—Scotsman.

"The story of a Hampshire belle's first season in Bath in the reign of Beau Nash, charmingly told. The illustrations are good, but no better than the word pictures of the old city in its sprightliest days."—Bookman.

NEW BOOKS.

BY T. F. THISELTON DYER.

SELECTED STORY BOOKS for CHILDREN.

BY E. N. LEIGH FRY.

SHREDS and PATCHES. Illustrated, 5s.

"The children are admirably drawn, as good as any that we have seen in fiction for a long time. Altogether, 'Shreds and Patches' is a good bit of work."—Spectator.

"The author has a thorough knowledge of little people's literary needs. Will give great pleasure to many young readers, which will be shared by some of their elders."—Morning Post.

"The prettily bound and pleasantly illustrated stories in 'Shreds and Patches' will delight the children for whom they are written. They are bright and natural relations of every-day occurrences. The talk is the talk of children, and the life is child life, which cannot often be said of these things in children's books."—Academy.

BY FRANCES M. PEARD.

MADEMOISELLE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"One of the pleasantest studies of family life that even this agreeable writer has published. As carefully written as it is agreeable."—Spectator.

"Mademoiselle' is a pleasing character. Her kindness toward the other and lowlier heroine, the pluck and patriotism she shows throughout the book, her noble and gentle character, win a reader's affection."—Speaker.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TIP-CAT."

LIL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

BY C. R. COLERIDGE AND M. BRAMSTON.

TRUTH with HONOUR. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

"A most effective story, worthy of the two distinguished writers who have combined to produce it."—Spectator.

BY STELLA AUSTIN.

LITTLE PRINCESS ANGEL. Crown 8vo, 5s.

PAUL'S FRIEND. With 16 Full-page Illustrations by S. B. GATES.

BY ALICE WEBER.

ANGELA: a Sketch. 4to, parchment wrapper. With Illustrations by T. Pym. 2s. 6d.

"A pretty story. Miss Weber paints her characters with a skilful and delicate hand. The book is a study, and certainly an interesting one."—Spectator.

IN the SPRING-TIME. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Is an advance on that most delicate study, 'Angela.' Miss Weber has not a superior, she has hardly a rival in the particular walk of fiction which she has selected for herself."—Spectator.

"It is a delightful study of girl-life."—Illustration.

LEAL SOUVENIR. Crown 8vo, 5s.

"Leal Souvenir' is an excellent book, well-written, and artistically finished."—Spectator.

BY J. A. LEFROY.

MISS MARGERY'S WAYS. With Illustration. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"We are obliged to the author for allowing us to make her acquaintance."—Spectator.

"The book is charming."—Literary Churchman.

WINGS without FEATHERS. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"One of the most entertaining little books that has ever come in our way. The hero of the story is a quite delightful child; to read about, he is almost incomparable."—Spectator.

DR. PARKE in EQUATORIAL AFRICA. With Map, Portrait, and numerous Illustrations from Drawings by Paul Hardy, Stanley Berkeley, and Lieut. Stairs. Demy 8vo, cloth, ONE GUINEA.

"Mr. Parke's journal fills up a distinct gap in the narrative of the expedition. Not only have we at last an authentic and detailed account of the many months' stay at Fort Boko, but all over Mr. Parke fills in many lacuna which have been left even in the detailed narrative of Mr. Stanley himself. Every page of the book bears witness to the kindness of heart and clearness of head of Surgeon Parke." Times.

"There are few pages of the book which do not contain observations and notes of special interest to medical readers. Dr. Parke shows himself to be a well-informed physician."

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., LONDON AND NEW YORK.

SPACIAL AND ATOMIC ENERGY.

Part III.—HEAT.

By FREDERICK MAJOR.

Price 7s. 6d.

From a standpoint that matter (ethereal and terrestrial) varies only on account of the manner of its concretion into rigid atoms by enforced cohesion. Atomic and molecular forces attributed to respiration, imparted by ethereal gas energy and Gravitation to effects attending "respirative" rise and fall imposed upon the "earth's surface."

The cause of Atomic and Molecular Action, Terrestrial Heat, Dew-point Cold, the Tides, Expansion and Contraction of Gases, the Electric states, Latent Heat, Combustion, and Explosion explained upon the above principles without according innate elastic, attractive, or fluid qualities to any matter.

"This is a learned dissertation of some 600 pages on the important subject, Heat. The author avoids mathematical formulae, his intention apparently being to seek a full explanation of known facts by close reasoning. To effect his purpose he calls to his aid man's extensive knowledge of natural phenomena, taking his subject in a skilful and methodical manner. One of the most interesting chapters is that on "Combustion," and here the author's knowledge and literary power appear at their best. His views on the theory of combustion are readily understood. The atomic and molecular theories are naturally the subject of much discussion, as well as the relation of the different states of matter, and the cause which brings about change of state."— Glasgow Herald.

"The work is one of a thoroughly scientific character, and in his treatment of a hard subject the writer has been happy both in his style and his selection of illustrations and description of experiments. The volume on 'Heat' embraces the whole field of a great and most interesting subject, and students of science—particularly of applied science—will extend to it a thorough welcome."— Scotsman.

THE

HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION,

By Dr. RUDOLPH GNEIST, Professor of Law in the University of Berlin.

Translated by PHILIP A. ASHWORTH, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* * This Edition contains additional Chapters on the Parliaments of the Nineteenth Century down to the Third Reform Bill (1834-5), with an important Note giving the Author's views on the Irish Question, and a New and copious Index.

"As a history of the English Constitution for English readers Dr. Gneist's book has a great advantage over existing treatises. It is not too much to say that Dr. Gneist is indispensable to the student of English constitutional history. . . . And English students have every reason to be grateful to Mr. Ashworth for introducing them to so valuable a work."— Athlete.

"This book is a monument of German patience and industry. . . . Dr. Gneist's book ought to be on the shelves of every student of our constitutional history."— Saturday Review.

THE CALIPHATE: its Rise, Decline, and Fall. By SIR WILLIAM MUIR, K.C.S.I., LL.D., D.C.L., Ph.D., Author of "The Life of Mahomet," "Mahomet and Islam," &c.

"The story of Islam, stationary as it is, is a study which Englishmen who represent, as Lord Beaconsfield used to say, a great Mussulm in power, have no right to neglect, and in this study Sir William Muir must always be regarded as one of the most competent and authoritative guides."—The Times.

"The volume does for the annals of the Caliphate something resembling what has been done by Green in his 'Short History' for the annals of the English people; and although it cannot be expected to arouse the same interest, it makes a literary pleasure of the duty laid upon the nation that holds India and controls Egypt, of understanding the beginning and the nature of the Moslem power."
The Scotsman.

"As the work of Sir William Muir this book has a special claim to be received with respect; for he is the first English scholar that has written the history of the Caliphate from the original Arabian authorities."—Saturday Review.

UNITED STATES PICTURES: Drawn with Pen and Pencil. By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "Norwegian Pictures," "London Pictures," &c. With a Map and 155 Engravings.

"The text is pleasantly written, and the woodcuts are always graphic, the whole forming an excellent introduction to the varied characteristics of American life and scenery."—The Globe.

"A reliable guide book and illustrated souvenir in one."
 Pall Mall Gazette.

"It is an exceedingly interesting volume."—Church Times.
"Mr. Lovett is informing but never wearisome, chatty but not garrulous, skilfully descriptive without ostentation or pretentiousness. It is a fascinating book in which the pictures rival the letter-press."
The Record.

DEAN & SON'S LIST.

Handsome bound, large post 8vo, 6s.
 BY JEAN DE LA BRETE.
UNCLE: a Story of Modern French Life. Edited by JOHN BEIWICK, and illustrated by R. André.
 The French Edition of this novel has had a sale of sixteen editions in seventeen months, and the first review of the English Edition received by the Publishers says:—"One of the most fascinating novels written for years."

Large post 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.
 BY WILLIAM H. STACPOLE, Author of "F.R.S.," &c.
THE THREE BOOTS.
 A STORY OF PRESENT-DAY LONDON. Illustrated.
 This clever novel turns upon an extraordinary hoax and a strange conspiracy.

Handsome bound, large post 8vo, 6s.
HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN'S CORRESPONDENCE
 With the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, the late Charles Dickens, and others. Edited by FREDERICK CRAWFORD. With a Memoir of Andersen and Portraits.
 Andersen's letters to his friends, which have been looked forward to as a literary treat, have a genuine ring about them, and most of them appear to have been written without any thought of their being published. Their great charm lies in their simplicity.

Handsome bound, large post 8vo, 6s.
 BY PHILIPPE TONELLI.
RETRIBUTION: a Corsican Vendetta
 Story. Illustrated by R. André.
 "Mr. Tonelli's book has the advantage of being written by one who has been able to impart more of vivid local colouring to his sketches of Corsican peasant life than is found in other volumes."—Morning Post.

Handsome bound, cloth gilt, gilt edges, large post 8vo, 10s. 6d.; or Library Edition, 2 vols., 6s. each.
 BY ARTHUR GODDARD.
PLAYERS OF the PERIOD. Being a Series of Anecdotal, Biographical, and Critical Monographs of the Leading Actors, including Henry Irving, Beerbohm Tree, J. L. Toole, &c. Illustrated by Fred Bernard, J. Bernard Partridge, and other well-known Artists.

MARRIAGE UP TO DATE.
 By the Author of "An American Widow," &c. 3 vols. [At all Libraries.]

"The author has made some excellent sketches of character... The sensational scenes are graphically drawn, and the story is well sustained and kept together. There are plenty of good situations which are made the most of, and the adventures of the heroine are well told... The writer cannot be blamed for seizing every opportunity to render his work amusing and attractive."—Public Opinion.
 "The sketches of the vain, ignorant, and vicious American, Cyrus Ludlow, are very amusing reading; the basis of the plot is interesting, and some of the portraits and conversations are well written... 'Marriage up to Date' forms a tale of absorbing interest, which from beginning to end is maintained at a high level."—Scotsman.

III.

BEATRICE and BENEDICK:
 A ROMANCE OF THE CRIMEA.
 By the Author of "The Outsider," "The Plunger," "Long Odds," "The Master of Rathkelly," "Thrice Past the Post," &c. 2 vols. [At all Libraries.]

"Well-told and stirring stories of the Crimean campaign form the background of Hawley Smart's new novel, which shows no falling off in nerve and liveliness from the usual calibre of his books."—Illustration.
 "Some rather attractive sketches of soldier life at home at the time of the outbreak of the Russian war, a family mystery, a suspicion of illicit coupling, or of treason, the leave-taking and departure of the troops, form a study of rather lively reading in the first volume. Pictures of camp life in the Crimea, and accounts of some of the fighting, with the added interest of the sympathy of the girls the heroes left behind them, the inevitable love complications, jealousies, and general gathering up of the threads of the story, to the sound of wedding bells, are the elements of the remainder of the story. The author has produced a tale of stirring times, which, to many people, will possess a deep and living interest."—Scotsman.

INTERFERENCE.
 By the Author of "Pretty Miss Neville," "Proper Pride," "Two Masters," &c. 3 vols. [At all Libraries.]

"'Interference' is a delightful story, fresh and unflagging... The plot, which strikes us as being thoroughly original, is well worked out, and the Indian scenes are very naturally done... It is not, however, for its ingenious plot only, that Mrs. Croker's book is to be recommended, but for its excellent sketches of character, especially of fresh upper middle-class life, and its humorous observation and description."—Standard.

V.
 By Mrs. Edward Kennard.
THAT PRETTY LITTLE HORSEBREAKER.
 By the Author of "The Girl in the Brown Habit," "Killed in the Open," "A Homburg Beauty," &c. 3 vols. [At all Libraries.]

"Mrs. Kennard is thoroughly at home in the hunting field; she knows all about horses, and people who ride them—that is, who ride them well... In the book before us she has a good story, and she tells it in a downright fashion that gives it a pleasant vividness... The story is told with a good deal of spirit, and the characters are drawn with individuality. The heroine is a plucky girl, not destitute of many charming ways... 'That Pretty Little Horsebreaker' has a certain dash and go in it that make it lively reading."—Standard.
 "It is an excellent tale... The charm of the volume lies in Mrs. Kennard's admirable description of hunting... 'That Pretty Little Horsebreaker' ought to find a home at all hunting-houses."—Whithall Review.

A DARK CHAPTER OF HISTORY.
THE PRINCESS TARA KANOVA.
 Translated from the Russian of DANILEVSKI. With Engraved Plates. 8vo, 10s. 6d.
 "This very remarkable book... fact stranger than fiction. It is well-known that a mysterious 'Pretender,' in the person of a young girl who called herself the Princess Tarakanova, shone from 1760 till 1776. The story is a fit subject for a novelist's pen, especially such a terse and vigorous pen as Danilevski's. The details of the fate of the unhappy lady were obtained from authentic official documents."—Queen.

THE BROWNING CYCLOPEDIA. By Dr. EDWARD BERDOE. Very thick large crown 8vo (about 700 pp.), 10s. 6d.

BY M. LAVISSE.

THE YOUTH OF FREDERICK
the GREAT. From the French of ERNEST LAVISSE.
By STEPHEN SIMEON. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"An important work which may be studied side by side with Carlyle."—Times.

"A brilliant historical study, marked by much literary ability."—Globe.

"Mr. Simeon has done his work so admirably that he does not allow the reader to realise the foreign origin of the book. Consequently one feels none of the vague distaste which is so commonly produced by translations."—Vanity Fair.

A NEW VOLUME OF ROAD TRAVEL.

ACROSS ENGLAND in a DOG-CART: from London to St. David's and Back. By JAMES JOHN HISSEY, Author of "A Tour in a Phaeton," &c. With 20 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author, and Plan of the Route. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"The more readers Mr. Hissey finds the more people there will be to confess that a journey by road through England can be one of the most enjoyable of things. It is certainly enjoyable in Mr. Hissey's pages, interrupted as those pages so frequently are by graphic woodcuts prepared from drawings by the author."—Globe.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL.

THE INSCRIPTIONS of COS.

By W. R. PATON and E. L. HICKS. With a Map of Cos. Royal 8vo, linen boards, price 28s.

It seems most desirable that the inscriptions of the more important Greek islands should be published in separate form, as the islands were from the earliest times, and still remain, very distinct communities, most retentive of their peculiarities. The editor spent some time at Cos in 1888: and as he found many unpublished inscriptions, and convinced himself that others had been inaccurately edited, he determined to undertake the preparation of a corpus of all the Coan Inscriptions known to him. He has received through out the assistance of the Rev. E. L. Hicks, who also contributes a full introduction on the History of Cos.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ANIMAL LIFE AND INTELLIGENCE."

ANIMAL SKETCHES.

A Popular Book of Natural History.

By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S.

With nearly Sixty Illustrations by W. MONKHOUSE ROWE. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. [Just Ready.]

A Book of Adventure for Boys.

BAREROCK; or, The Island of Pearls

By HENRY NASH.

Illustrated by LANCELOT SPEED. Now Ready. Large crown 8vo, handsomely bound, gilt edges, 6s.

"A story of shipwreck and adventure which is calculated to make Daniel Defoe jealously uneasy in his grave."—Evening News.

"For fertility of invention, wealth of imagination, and luxuriousness of incident, commend us to 'Barerock.' While enchantingly interesting, it is also a splendid moral lesson to read how it becomes possible, under a resourceless condition, to carve out one's own fortunes. In breathless haste, incident succeeds incident, till, thrilled and throbbing, the reader regretfully turns over the last page."—Sheffield Telegraph.

FRIENDS OF THE OLDEN TIME.

By ALICE GARDNER.

Illustrated, square 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A capital little book for children, whose interest in history it is desired to stimulate by lively and picturesque narratives of the lives of heroes and the nobler aspects of heroic times. Leonidas and Pericles, Solon and Socrates, Camillus and Hannibal, the Gracchi and Alexander, form the subject of Miss Gardner's animated recitals, which possess all the charm of simplicity and clearness that should belong to stories told to children."—Saturday Review.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

ANIMAL LIFE and INTELLIGENCE.

By Professor C. LLOYD MORGAN, F.G.S.

With 40 Illustrations and Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 16s.

"A learned and elaborate work. . . . Professor Lloyd Morgan is eminently qualified, and his book is one which no serious student can neglect."—Times.

"Perhaps one of the finest passages in the whole treatise is that in which the object and system of evolution is described. One of the most interesting parts of the book to the general reader is that which is devoted to the faculties of animals. . . . All will agree in admiring the masterly handling, the impartiality, and the absence of dogmatism which characterise Professor Morgan's work."—Daily News.

"A perfectly charming book."—Daily Telegraph.

LITERATURE.

SOME HISTORICAL BOOKS.

Three Centuries of Derbyshire Annals. By the Rev. Dr. J. Charles Cox. In 2 vols. (Bemrose.)

"THE CAMDEN LIBRARY."—The Antiquities and Curiosities of the Exchequer. By Hubert Hall. (Elliot Stock.)

Oxford Lectures and other Discourses. By Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. (Macmillans.)

"THE SAGA LIBRARY."—Vol. I. The Story of Howard the Hatt. The Story of the Banded Men. The Story of Hen Thorir. Vol. II. The Story of the Ere-Duellers. Done into English out of the Icelandic. By William Morris and Eiríkr Magnússon. (Bernard Quaritch.)

It is now about fourteen years since Mr. Hamilton directed the public attention to the question of publishing the county records. His work was chiefly based on the records of Quarter Sessions in Devonshire. There had been indeed a much earlier account of the Quarter Sessions of Somerset, but the book was little known and not easily to be procured. The example set by Mr. Hamilton has been followed in several counties. "The Records of the North Riding of Yorkshire," says Dr. Cox, "are being gradually printed for subscribers under the editorship of the Rev. J. C. Atkinson"; the Middlesex County Records are being brought out under the supervision of Mr. J. Cordy Jeaffreson; the early Sessions Rolls for the West Riding have been edited by Mr. John Lister; and a great impetus has been given to the whole movement by the foundation of the British Record Society. The Derbyshire collections begin with scattered documents from the opening years of Queen Elizabeth's reign, but there is no regular series before 1682. The continuous series of documents relating to Somerset begins as early as 1647, and there are other sets of county records which have come down to us from nearly as early a date. But though the Derbyshire collection may be called "imperfect and fragmentary" to this extent, the work before us shows that Dr. Cox is justified, on the whole, in describing it as "the most valuable and varied collection possessed by any one of the English counties." Dr. Cox has written so much on the local history of Derbyshire, and is so familiar with the records and state papers affecting his subject, that he has been able to arrange the details of a dry matter in such a way as to make pleasant reading for all who care for pictures of the simple provincial life and old-world customs of our ancestors. This is not the place to speak in detail of the particular incidents comprised in these two handsome volumes, but it is worth noticing that the recent discovery of records at Belvoir Castle has enabled the author to give a very complete account of the sufferings of the recusants in the reign of Elizabeth, and that under the heading of "Capital Punishment" a very striking use has been made of Shelley's rare pamphlet, occasioned by his presence at an execution for high treason at Derby, and entitled "We pity the plumage, but forget the dying bird."

The ancient methods of county finance are very clearly set out in Mr. Hall's work on The Antiquities and Curiosities of the Exchequer. Notwithstanding the fact that the royal treasure had to be administered by fixed rules from the earliest times, it seems clear that the Court of Exchequer, as we know it, was not founded till the reign of Henry I. From that time the sheriffs were regularly summoned to attend the Easter and Michaelmas sessions, at which they had to account for the revenues due to the Crown from the counties, according to a rude method of comparing counters and tallies which has not long become obsolete. Mr. Hall gives an interesting account of the great chequered table on which the clumsy counters were set to balance each other till the accounts were complete. Sir John Lubbock remarks, in his entertaining preface to the work, that, though the proceedings in the Exchequer may appear to us absurdly archaic, we must remember "that the wooden 'tallies' on which a large notch represented a thousand pounds and smaller notches other sums, while a halfpenny was denoted by a small round hole, were actually in use at the Exchequer until the year 1824"; and he adds that he has in his own possession a "tally" representing a sum of £21,000, advanced to the Crown by the East India Company. Mr. Hall shows himself to be quite familiar with the questions discussed in Madox's great work on the History of the Exchequer. He has also very rightly made great use of the celebrated Dialogus de Scaccario, the work of Richard Fitz-Nigel, Bishop of London, in the reign of Henry II., a member of the family of the Bishop of Salisbury, who had originally organised the court. This treatise has been justly said to contribute "an extraordinary mass of information on every important point in the development of constitutional principles before the Great Charter." It is a somewhat remarkable circumstance, which does not as yet appear to have been explained, that this work is quoted by Lord Coke and Sir William Dugdale as a book on Tenures of the King, written but not finished by one Ockam in the reign of Henry II.; but, as Mr. Hargrave long ago said, "What was Lord Coke's reason for attributing the dialogue to this Ockam it is not easy to guess." Mr. Hall gives a very full account of the great robbery of the Treasury in the year 1302 by a pedlar named Richard de Podelicote, with the connivance of certain monks at Westminster, who had been left in charge of the regalia and stores of bullion. It appears that the robbers were so careless of their booty that many strangers had picked up silver cups, gold ornaments, and jewels outside Westminster Hall and in the cemetery by St. Margaret's Church. We are told that the fishermen of Battersea brought up silver plate in their nets, and that "the stores of half the goldsmiths in London were glutted with what were discovered by inquisition to be the principal contents of the royal treasury." The readers of the work will learn the meaning of many strange terms, of scutage and carucage, of blanching the sheriffs' payments, and the proper methods of the survey of green-wax, and the trial of the pyx. Mr. Hall must also be credited with having brought together several original theories on matters connected with his special subject, and with having succeeded, so far as can be done within the limits of a popular treatise, in reconstructing

"the ancient exchequer, its treasury and house, with their chests and rolls and tallies, its chess-board and game of counters, wherein the annual budget was figured by rude and visible symbols; its working staff, and all the chief appurtenances of its mediæval existence."

A considerable part of Sir Frederick Pollock's volume represents the substance of lectures delivered by him as Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence at Oxford; but he has also taken the opportunity of preserving some very interesting essays on the proper use of law libraries, and on the library of the Alpine Club, of which he has been so long the honorary librarian, together with a discourse on the forms and history of the sword, containing much entertaining information about the art of fencing, in which he is well known to be an expert. We may mention, without discussing, the able essay on religious equality, which takes the form of a dialogue between a student of politics and a Nonconforming Doctor of Divinity, and the discourse upon Home Rule and Imperial Sovereignty, which was first published in 1888 in the volume called The Truth about Home Rule. One cannot help being glad that Sir Frederick Pollock has reprinted the well-known article on Examinations and Education, in which, after a large experience as examinee and afterwards as examiner, he denounces the greater part of the existing competitive system as "machinery worship run mad," useful, if at all, as a specimen of the wrong way to examine. We appear to have borrowed our system of selection by examination from the Chinese empire, together with many other things which have become connected with our daily life. In the cases of gunpowder, the compass, and the printing-press, we have improved considerably on the lessons first received; but our system of selection for office by means of literary competitions appears still to retain too much of the barbarian influence. It is only fair, however, to remember that the system was adopted not, so far as appears, in the interest of the competitors, but rather as a means of defence for the office-givers against the ever-growing army of applicants. The most striking essay in the collection is the memorial lecture upon Sir Henry Maine and his work. Sir Frederick Pollock points out that the conditions of his own office were framed for the purpose of giving scope to the peculiar genius of Sir Henry Maine in the lines of inquiry which he himself had opened. There is something strikingly appropriate to the present moment in the passages showing that Sir Henry Maine was in no sense a specialist: "not only was he a humanist before he was a jurist, but he never ceased to be a humanist," and in this, says his successor, lay some part of the secret of his method. Sir Frederick Pollock enlarges on this point in a striking passage, in which he shows how great a power learning still continues to be in the civilised world:

"We are too much tempted to forget the humanities. There are even some who would counsel us to put them behind us. We may be thankful for Maine's witness that the humanities are a living power, and the wisdom of the ancients is justified of her children even among the strange people. In this place, at all events, we shall not forget the words spoken by Maine to our sister University—words the more remarkable for their breadth and daring in a speaker usually so cautious: 'Except the blind forces of Nature, nothing moves in this world which is not Greek in its origin.'"

Of the remaining essays, perhaps the historical account of the English Manor contains the most valuable information. The manor is viewed "as a fortress island of Franco-Norman feudalism, strangely blended with ancient local custom." Sir Frederick Pollock points out that our notions of the ancient English land system must be to a great extent conjectural, that the charters collected by Kemble were mostly grants of lordship and not of occupying possession, and that the charters were framed by clerks who were imbued with Romanised learning, "and who were thinking much more of their continental models than of explaining actual English usage to posterity." He avoids giving a final answer to an almost insoluble problem. He points out that, if we leave out one or other of its normal incidents, it is easy to find a semblance to the English manor in many times and lands. We cannot as yet give an exact definition of the manor as it first appears in our country; but it is obvious that Sir Frederick Pollock is right when he says that "the history of private jurisdiction seems to be the point on which research may now be most hopefully concentrated."

It is a question of some difficulty whether a translation of the Icelandic Sagas should be included in a list of historical works. These Sagas take the form of history, and very often contain valuable notices of events elsewhere unrecorded. They cannot, however, when all is said, be set higher than romance founded upon very ancient biographies or stories of adventure. The "Saga Library," of which two volumes have now appeared, is intended to contain a series of tales and family histories, dating for the most part from the thirteenth century, which may interest the general reading public, besides appealing in a more special way to students of the Scandinavian folk-lore, language, and institutions. The editors point out that a journey in Iceland is a continual illustration of the books containing the domestic annals of its ancient people. "While over the greater part of Europe, at least, all knowledge of their historical past has faded from the memory of the people," and the last vestiges of their pre-historical memories are rapidly disappearing, in Iceland "every homestead, one may almost say every field, has its well-remembered history." These statements are doubtless true in the main; but it ought also to be remembered that these domestic histories, though now familiar to all, were at one time quite neglected and forgotten, their place being taken by the pedantic romances of mediæval chivalry, with tales of Sir Hector and the loss of Troy, of Arthur and Merlin and all the heroes of Lyonesse. The impetus which caused the compilation and collection of the Sagas was due to the fall of the Icelandic republic in the middle of the thirteenth century. The stories themselves seem to have fallen into oblivion before the beginning of the fifteenth century, and to have been only recovered several generations afterward, during the search for antiquities connected with the ancestors of the kings of Denmark. The first volume commences with the story of Howard the Halt. Like most of the other domestic Sagas, it is connected with the biographies of the first settlers in Iceland; and, indeed, it is difficult to imagine how these stories could have been written if Ari the Learned had not composed his great chronicle of the first land-settlement. The editors rightly point out that the tale of Howard is more of a story and less of a chronicle, and they justly remark that its subject-matter—"the triumph of an old and seemingly worn-out man over his powerful enemies"—is peculiarly interesting and fresh in a time when the novel more and more conforms to its old definition as "a smooth tale generally of love." We may observe that the story is partly in verse, not, apparently, of a very high quality in its original form; and, if Mr. Vigfússon is to be trusted, one might reject these "lays of the Mewlithers" as a late and unauthorised addition to the ancient work. The story of the Banded Man, though professing to deal with the period of the first settlement of the island, is admitted to be dramatic rather than historical. It seems to be intended as a satire on the administration of justice in the thirteenth century. The editors praise it as a model of dramatic narrative; and they are certainly justified in their claim that "the quaint reversal of the parts usually played by father and son into those of the prodigal father and the money-prudent son is very taking and amusing." The last story in the volume deals with the customs prevailing in Iceland during the heathen period, and with the change in the system of government introduced by Thord the Yeller in the year 965. Its principal point of interest lies in the description of the custom of taking possession of unoccupied land by the ceremony of hallowing the land by fire. This story is also useful as containing information about the duties of the sacerdotal chieftains ruling over each tribe that used a temple in common. The religious functions of these officials are more fully described in the Eyrbyggja Saga, which is familiar to all in the delightful version by Sir Walter Scott, and of which a fuller and more accurate edition forms the second volume of this series, under the title The Story of the Ere-Dwellers, with the Story of the Heath-Slayings as an appendix. The story should be a favourite with all who rejoice in our modern fashion in a tale of grim man-slayings, and demons, vampires, and ghost-hauntings. From an historical point of view, it is chiefly valuable for its classical description of the temple of Thor and the practices of his worshippers, which is no doubt derived from an authentic record preserved by Ari the Learned. The reader should, however, be warned that there is a more romantic account of the same matters in the Keelmassings Saga, which cannot boast the same authority. It may also be worth notice that the Ere-Dwellers' story winds up with an interpolated episode relating to an imaginary voyage from Iceland to a great country in the West, which has sometimes been accepted as a serious testimony to the former existence of a Greater Ireland across the Atlantic. CHARLES ELTON.

Poems. By William Hartpole Lecky. (Longmans.)

In one of the poems in this volume the author alludes to the survival of ancestral type: how, in the face of a dead man, "the older dead look down." In this collection of verse, which the philosopher has given us in his maturity, and where his intellectual energy lies utterly inert, the curious student of literature may find one of the most extraordinary instances of literary atavism which could be adduced. With the Victorian poet Mr. Lecky has nothing in common: he does not even breathe the same air. Even if these pieces which he has published were written in his teens, they are touched with that old age which has known no youth. The sons of Apollo, whose names must have had a clarion ring in Mr. Lecky's ears when he was a young man, have influenced him no whit more than have Lord Tennyson or Robert Browning, Mr. William Morris or Mr. Swinburne. Even Longfellow, who, one could imagine, must be Mr. Lecky's favourite among modern poets, does not educe an echo. Wordsworth, in his most unimpassioned moods, might, perhaps, have written some of the freer and less conventional pieces. Coleridge, Keats, Shelley, Byron, and even Scott.—Mr. Lecky, apparently, knows them not, nor the speech they speak, nor the dreams they dream. For the "forbears" of these poems are of an earlier period still; they are to be found in the "Keepsakes" and "Friendship's Offerings" of our great-grandmothers. Some of them hark back to a yet earlier parentage, and one is often puzzled by such remote Georgian reverberations as:

"Now the ice is smooth and strong,
Hasten, hasten, ladies gay,
Join the undulating throng,
'Tis the skaters' holiday;
Youth, with Pleasure in her train,
Lightly skims the glittering plain."

There are, it is true, one or two echoes of a later date. A famous passage in Burns is no doubt responsible for "Life seems but a painted thing,

An insect with a gaudy wing,
A full-blown rose, a lover's dream,
The light that sparkles on the stream."

And "The Dreamer," beginning

"A young man wandered alone by the shore,
And he said as he gazed on the sea—" is clearly a reminiscence of Heine's "Jungling-Mann," who also brooded on the mystery of ocean (which Mr. Lecky calls "the watery gleam") but showed his good sense by mocking his own folly.

"And the thoughts that passed through [this] young man's brain Were turned into waves of song"— but apparently not for long, for Mr. Lecky adds that—

"... he lies on the lonely shore,
With folded arms and a dreamless brain,
For ever and evermore."

On the whole, this young man and his thoughts hardly warrant the affectionate heed of the chronicler. Once or twice, again, Mr. Lecky has seemingly been inspired by the later Scottish ballads. The wild lilt of "O wha be ye wad cross Loch Gyle" becomes

"The sun was fading in the west,
A flush was on the ocean's breast,
And, feebly bright'ning, Dian's crest
Ascended in the sky."

"A maiden stood upon the shore,
She marked the storm grow more and more,
And to the angry billow's roar
Responded with a sigh."

This is unsatisfactory enough, and even more disastrous is the would-be weird close of "Forebodings"; but what is to be said of the central quatrains?

"Speak, speak, tumultuous wave," she cried,
'Say where is he whose joy and pride
Was on thy foaming crest to ride,
When tempests raged above?"

"Slowly the weary hours move on,
Thrice garish day has come and gone,
Thrice have the stars grown pale and wan.
In waiting for my love."

There is surely no evasion of the answer that this is below the level even of the verse that adorns young ladies' albums? It is a strange thing that so able a prose writer as Mr. Lecky should, when unfortunately laid low through an attack of versifying fever, contentedly abuse common sense, and even good grammar. In his profoundly interesting and valuable philosophical and historical works, he writes with vigour, lucidity, and a native directness which is often of singular charm; with serene judgment and logical foresight, he marshals his words and phrases with all the wise economy and tactical skill of a veteran. But what is one to think of such writing as that just quoted? The first quatrain would not require a perfecting touch from a parodist.

It would be an ungrateful task to go through this volume, poem by poem, and indicate every unfortunate lapse from true literary sentiment. Mr. Lecky's shortcomings as a poet are almost as noticeable in his best as in his worst productions. Even in a piece of a dozen lines, he betrays that lack of poetic instinct which is absolutely fatal. "Seaside" is certainly one of the best poems in the book:—

"How pleasing to the beauty-loving eye
That long, low line where land and ocean meet;
The one as still and silent as the tomb,
The other with a gentle rise and fall,
And with a heavy breathing sound—it seems Like Sleep embracing her sad sister Death,
*Or like a terrified and panting mother
Stroking the temples of her swooning child,
And sighing as she sees her toil in vain.*
In such a scene fond memories weave their spell,
And hopes grow high, and fancy seeks and finds
The far horizon of her noblest dreams, Till, like the sea our thoughts stretch on to heaven."

"Fond memories weaving their spell" is not the only commonplace utterance here, though the most disastrous; but what is more notable is the perpetration of a simile hopelessly variant from its correlative. The italicised lines have a certain beauty; but if the sea be like Sleep (and therefore profoundly quiescent), embracing her sad sister Death—and Mr. Lecky does not improve upon Shelley—how can it at the same time be described as "a terrified and panting mother"?

From beginning to end of the volume there is a procession of unfortunate metaphors, unhappy similes, unalluring images of all kinds. The potter has taken up the delicate chisel of the sculptor in ivory, and the result is neither gracious form nor useful earthenware. That a writer should be unable to express himself artistically in a method and manner alien to his mental constitution is readily understandable, but it remains a puzzle how Mr. Lecky has allowed to pass in verse what he would never write in prose. What "fearful wild-fowl" of a metaphor is this?

"He hung on beauty like a star
That hangs upon the sky."

In an historical essay would Mr. Lecky care to utter such a flat truism, and so confusedly expressed, as

"All that is best must die before
Our steps have touched the silent shore
Where the last wave is still."

These two extracts are from the first poem in the book, whence also come "How autumn paints the fading trees;" "The moanings of the fitful breeze"; "And every new succeeding day, Seemed sparkling as it came"; "Ambition swept her sounding lyre"; and those time-honoured twins, "the joys of childhood" and "manhood's toils."

It would be easy to ridicule this book; but to do so would be to blind oneself to the author's evident sincerity, and to the many tokens of a fine intelligence, a delicate spirit, a deep and broad human sympathy. Mr. Lecky's mistake has been in making public that which should have been reserved for a private circle. When he appears as a poet he must be judged accordingly, and without respect to his high achievement in other departments of letters. It would be insincere for the present writer to say that he finds anywhere in Mr. Lecky's verse that particular magic which is the outcome of the transforming imagination—in a word, that essential breath of poetic life without which all is vanity. But, on the other hand, it would be not less unjust to deny that Mr.

Lecky has the poetic faculty in any degree. He is simply touching a few keys on an instrument with whose mysteries he is unfamiliar. A man may be an orator, and have a voice potent to sway gods and men, and yet the moment he attempts to sing may lose all sense of rhythmic balance, all control over his mental processes even. Mr. Lecky, assured of his mastery in his own métier, has made a like attempt, and has failed. At his best, however, when he has thrown his "Friendship's Offering" singing robes aside, and shut his ears to the promptings of a too didactic muse, he can be listened to with a certain pleasure. Our ears are not always keen for the highest music, nor our minds eager to fathom perilous seas of thought; and ear and brain have often to be satisfied with far less agreeable entertainment than "He Found His Work" or "Passion and Memory," "The National Portrait Gallery" or "On an Old Song":

"Little snatch of ancient song,
What has made thee live so long:
Flying on thy wings of rhyme
Lightly down the depths of time,
Telling nothing strange or rare,
Scarce a thought or image there,
Nothing but the old, old tale
Of a hapless lover's wail;
Offspring of an idle hour,
Whence has come thy lasting power?
By what turn of rhythm or phrase,
By what subtle careless grace,
Can thy music charm our ears
After full three hundred years?"

"Little song, since thou wert born,
In the Reformation morn,
How much great has passed away,
Shattered or by slow decay,
Stately piles in ruins crumbled,
Lordly houses lost and humbled,
Thrones and realms in darkness hurled,
Noble flags for ever furled,
Wisest schemes by statesmen spun,
Time has seen them one by one
Like the leaves of Autumn fall—
A little song outlives them all."

WILLIAM SHARP.

Livingstone and the Exploration of Central Africa. By H. H. Johnston. (Philip & Son.)

In the Preface we are warned that this is not a biography in the ordinary sense, which would be somewhat superfluous after the works of Dr. Blaikie and Mr. Hughes. As one of Messrs. Philips' series of "The World's Great Explorers," it deals primarily with Livingstone's life-work; and its chief merit is that it fully carries out the purpose of that most useful series which, in the language of the editors, aims at doing "ample justice to geographical results, while the personality of the explorer is never lost sight of." It has another great merit, one in this instance by no means of easy attainment, that of perfect impartiality and an absolutely unbiassed treatment of his subject. As the author somewhat quaintly puts it—

"He has caught eagerly at every legitimate opportunity for blaming, criticising, and even sneering at Dr. Livingstone's character and actions, in the dread lest his writing should become a mere monotonous eulogy; and if these opportunities are so few that the general estimate of this book is that of nearly unmitigated praise, the conclusion to be drawn is that Livingstone was a really great and good man, and that it is impossible to belittle him by recounting the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Thus it is frankly admitted that Livingstone acted "with some harshness and unfairness" in dismissing Thornton and Baines on trivial grounds during the Nyassa expedition of 1859. The occasion is even improved to do justice to the memory of Thomas Baines, pioneer, artist, and soldier, a man who played many parts in his time, who was the first to secure concessions from King Lobengula to work the Matabili gold mines, and who thus prepared the way for the recent extension of orderly government under the British administration from the Orange to the Zambesi.

On the other hand, Livingstone himself is amply vindicated from the charge of dereliction of duty brought against him by the "severely good people," because at the turning point in his career he ceased to be officially the agent of a missionary society, and became instead the greatest of modern explorers, while remaining a missionary in spirit to the end of his days. "My views of what is missionary duty," he wrote at the time to one of these people, "are not so contracted as those whose ideal is a dumpy sort of a man with a Bible under his arm." Strange that these same unco righteous censors, who objected to Livingstone's action in opening up heathendom to Christian influences, see no harm in thousands of parsons turning pedagogues and expending their apostolic zeal in the interpretation of Pagan text books.

In following Livingstone's footsteps during his long wanderings over half a continent, nobody could desire a safer guide than Consul Johnston, himself an African explorer of high repute, an intelligent observer of the physical conditions of that region, a diligent student of its complicated ethnological relations, and personally familiar with most of the ground first revealed to the world by this indomitable traveller. The excellent plan is adopted of first giving a general survey of the land itself, its physical features, climate, natural history, and inhabitants, and then accompanying the explorer in his various itineraries up and down the several regions so described. We seem thus to follow leisurely in the track of the pioneer, who cuts his way through the tangle of tropical woodlands, makes smooth the rough places, bridges over the swift stream, and sets up finger-posts at the cross-roads. And all this is done with the broad grasp of a master of his subject, as witness the graphic description of Bechuanaland, starting point of the Livingstonian Odyssey:

"The general aspect of Bechuanaland to a superficial observer would be that of a desert, a blank, hopeless wilderness of rocks and sand, and grey, lifeless scrub. As a matter of fact, it consists, generally speaking, of a sunbaked tableland, from which rise flat-topped hill-ranges, with steep, crumbling sides, like cake roughly cut with a knife. These latter are really the remains of a still higher plateau that has been eaten away, carved and crumbled by water, wind, sun, and frost, till there are but the harder, less friable portions remaining in these low ranges of table mountains, or in the isolated stools or hillocks which the Dutch call Koppes. Dry watercourses, broad enough to be the beds of first-class rivers, wind and wiggle-waggle between the fragments of the broken tableland, which they, when they were strong streams of water in the distant past, cut up and parcelled out into isolated blocks."

Equally excellent is the long section devoted to the Zambesi basin, altogether an admirable synthesis of the information that has been rapidly accumulated on that vast region during the last few decades. Here, however, there appears to be some little confusion regarding the tribal or national names, which are a source of so much bewilderment throughout Austral Africa, either because of their numerous variants or of their recurrence in districts separated by hundreds of miles and scores of intervening groups. Thus we have the variants Ba-Toka and Ba-Tonga, north of the middle Zambesi, reappearing under one or other of these forms south of that river in Manicaland, and beyond the Limpopo between Delagoa Bay and Zululand. So with the Barotse, formerly dominant in Central Zambesia, for a time eclipsed by the Makololo intruders from Basutoland, and now again the ruling people in that region. Mr. Johnston writes (p. 146) that "for some reason or other the Makololo called the Baloi the 'Barotse,' which name has stuck to them ever since." And again: "The valley of the Upper Zambesi ninety years ago was in possession of the Barotse people, who formerly called themselves Balui or Baloi." These statements are quite misleading. The Balui and Barotse are different peoples, the former being the true aborigines, akin to the Ba-Lunda of the Congo basin, while the latter, like the Makololo themselves, are intruders from the far South. In fact, these Barotse (Ba-Harutse, Ba-Hurutse) are a northern section of the formerly powerful Barotse nation, who are already spoken of by Lichtenstein (1804-5), under the name of Muchurahzi, and who are acknowledged by all the other Bechuana nations as the elder branch of the wide-spread Bechuana family. Their original home was about the headwaters of the Limpopo; but their power was broken by incessant wars, first with Umzilikatsi's Zulu hordes, then with the Boer Voor-Trekkers; the result being that they were mostly driven beyond the west frontier of the present Transvaal, and dispersed in various directions. One section took refuge in the middle Zambesi Valley, where they founded the Barotse empire, overthrown by the Makololo, in recent times restored, and, since 1890, a British protectorate. It was during the Makololo interregnum that Livingstone twice traversed this region, first on his way from Bechuanaland to the West Coast, and then across the continent from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean. On his way east he was accompanied by a few of these Makololo, who became the founders of the present so-called Makololo chieftaincies in the Shiré basin. It is noteworthy, as showing how tribes and tongues may, even in a comparatively short period, become almost hopelessly confused, that, although the Makololo perished nearly to a man in the "Barotse Revolution," their language survived. It had already been imposed on their Balui and Barotse subjects; hence the curious phenomenon that Se-Suto is at present the chief medium of intercourse throughout Central Zambesia, where there are no longer any Basutos.

Another source of perplexity is the uncertain orthography of these names, and it is to be regretted that Mr. Johnston's essays at spelling reform will scarcely tend to improve matters in this respect. It is generally admitted that the phonetics of most African, and certainly of all Bantu, idioms are best represented by a combination of the English consonantal and the Italian vowel systems. Hence ch, for instance, is usually employed for the fricative, as in "chin," so common in these languages. But Mr. Johnston now substitutes the un-English and somewhat uncouth ts, even in long-established words, writing unnecessarily and against all precedent, "Tshad," "Betschuana," "Setshela," &c., for the simple "Chad," "Bechuana," "Sechele," &c.

But these are small blemishes in a work which maintains throughout a high standard of excellence, and which is written in the bright vivacious style characteristic of all Mr. Johnston's works. Vivid, truthful descriptions of natural features are of frequent occurrence. Such is the account of the shallow, saline, and lacustrine depressions of the Kalahari wilderness, some of which "are evaporated to great salt-pans, which are a whitish-grey in colour, seen close at hand, but a delicious pale sparkling azure when viewed from a height or from a distance, and when the sun is shining on them. In the mid-day heats the cruel mirage plays about the saline concave bed of the evaporated lake, and brings back the ghost of the vanished water, making it ripple and sparkle in the hazy sunshine, and break, seemingly, into wavelets on the marge, while stately, non-existent trees and bosky islands of equal unsubstantiality dot the shimmering expanse, and repeat themselves in reflections down the streaky mirror of the unreal water."

There are numerous illustrations of very unequal merit, including a good portrait of Livingstone, and a striking head of a Manyema cannibal, both by the author—one after a photograph, the other an original drawing. The work is fittingly dedicated to Mr. E. G. Ravenstein, prince of African cartographers, who has enriched this volume with a series of useful maps on a small scale, but remarkably clear and, of course, well up to date. A. H. KEANE.

George Fife Angus: Father and Founder of South Australia. By Edwin Hodder. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

MR. HODDER has undertaken the biography of a merchant and philanthropist of undoubted energy, capacity, and determination, whose name nevertheless is probably unknown to many of our readers. This objection is anticipated by the author in his preface; he foresees that it is not improbable some may ask the question, "Who was George Fife Angus?" This question he answers as follows:—

"He was one of the fathers and founders of South Australia; he originated the South Australian Company, the Bank of South Australia, the National Provincial Bank of England, and the Union Bank of Australia; he fought the battle of the slaves in Honduras and the Mosquito Coast, and obtained an Act of Parliament for their emancipation; he circumvented a reigning monarch and stayed a despotic religious persecution; his foresight and shrewdness won for Great Britain the possession of New Zealand as a colony; he realised a large fortune, lost it in pure philanthropy, and after years of poverty and distress, regained it four-fold through the reckless land purchases of an adventurer; he established the first Sunday School Union in the North of England, was one of the founders of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society and other well-known institutions, and was, fifty years ago, one of the leading 'philanthropists' of this country."

Mr. Angas, who was born in May, 1789, when, as Mr. Hodder oddly tells us, "Wellington was just out of his teens," was the son of a coach-builder at Newcastle, descended from a border family of the name of Angus. Why Angus was changed to Angas is unknown. A suggestion, and more than a suggestion, is made that this family of Angus was related to the earls of Angus, who adopted the side of the Reformation in Scotland. Not a shadow of proof of this is given beyond the statement that one Alexander Angus, an ancestor of the subject of this biography, came to Newcastle about the year 1584, when Archibald, ninth Earl of Angus, was living in that town. The inventor of the suggestion was probably unaware that the surname of the Earl of Angus was Douglas. Young Angas was, by his own desire, apprenticed to his father's business, and in due course became a partner. The firm consisted of the father and his four sons, of whom George Fife was the youngest. Besides coach-building the firm had an extensive trade with British Honduras; and all he learned of the sufferings of the natives of that settlement, who had been reduced to slavery by the white population, deeply interested young Angas in their welfare, both spiritual and temporal. With the assistance, first of Wilberforce and Zachary Macaulay, and then of Sir Matthew Ridley and Colonel Arthur, he succeeded in getting an Act of Parliament passed "for the liberation of the aboriginal slaves who were kept in unlawful bondage in British Honduras." This was certainly a considerable exploit for a young and comparatively unknown man, and illustrates his perseverance and force of character as fully as any of his later and, in some ways, more important achievements.

It is by his share in the foundation of the colony of South Australia that the name of George Angas is best known. This share was a very large and important one, but not sufficient to warrant the title given to him by Mr. Hodder of "Father and Founder of South Australia." Mr. Angas was one of the ten commissioners appointed under an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1834 for founding that colony; and when experience proved that the scheme as originally planned was impracticable, he was instrumental in setting on foot the South Australian Company, which was to come to the assistance of the commissioners, and which he compared to a scaffolding which is needful to the erection of a building, but is taken down when the building is completed. The objects of the founders of South Australia were principally the absolute exclusion of convicts, the disposal of the land in small quantities, the introduction of industrious families, and the absence of a state-aided form of religion. In this last particular we see Mr. Angas at once. The Company was supplemented by the Bank of South Australia, which originated with Mr. Angas. It was very shortly after the establishment of the bank that an event happened which throws a strong light on his peculiar character. He had taken a leading part in settling in the new colony a body of Lutherans who dissented from the form of religion established by the then king of Prussia. These persons were, no doubt, likely men to form useful colonists; but it was their religious differences with the government of Prussia which attracted Mr. Angas. He liberally advanced money to help them in their passage from Germany to South Australia; but these men, who were ready for the sake of their own form of Christianity to leave their homes were not so ready to pay their just debts. In the words of Mr. Hodder: "They omitted to make corresponding efforts to discharge their pecuniary obligations to Mr. Angas." He, therefore, sent out a confidential clerk to look after his money relations with the German emigrants. This agent cannot have had very definite instructions; for, instead of looking after the defaulting Lutherans, he plunged into vast speculation in land under his employer's name, and contrived to render him liable for a present sum of £28,000, and much larger sums in the future. These transactions require much more explanation than Mr. Hodder is able to give of them; but this much is clear, that Mr. Angas had been entirely taken in by what is called the "Christian character" of his clerk, and that if he had given him a properly limited authority to act for him these speculations could not have been carried out. Mr. Angas was reduced to the brink of ruin, but treated his misfortune as a dispensation of Providence, and not as the result of his own mismanagement. The extracts from his diary given by the author show this plainly. In the end Mr. Angas was no loser; he became proprietor of 24,000 acres of most valuable land, though it is difficult to reconcile this possession with the fundamental rules of the colony, one of which was the disposal of the land in small quantities. Some years later, in 1850, Mr. Angas left England, and settled on his Australian property.

His life in Australia, though he was sixty-one when he landed there, was as active as it had been at home, and as eminently useful. He was for a long period a member of the Legislative Council, and a decided Conservative.

"He could not keep pace—or, rather, he did not wish to keep pace—with the advanced Liberalism which was, in his opinion, developing too rapidly; and he felt it to be his duty to put a drag on the wheels of state. In one of his early speeches, when an amendment of the new constitution was being discussed, he said: 'He had always admired the wisdom of the Town Clerk at Ephesus, who had recommended a very excited assembly to do nothing rashly, and the same advice he would earnestly give to that House.'"

In one thing, however, he adhered to his early prejudices, and that was his determined opposition to any state aid to religion. He was successful in opposing it in South Australia. The result was not satisfactory; he had, at a later period, to lament that religion was at a low ebb in the colony. It did not even occur to him that the absence of the religious teaching the state might have given might be, in a measure at least, the cause of the sad state of things he bewailed; but he attributed it to the tendency of the climate! That Mr. Angas's religion was sincere and influenced every act of his life is apparent on every page of his biography; but it was a religion of the most narrow and Puritan type, and we cannot agree in Mr. Hodder's admiration of it. To our mind Mr. Angas's claim, and just claim, to the respect of posterity rests on his courage, his uprightness, his dogged perseverance, and his indefatigable industry. He was not always right, and the laudations of his biographer require some discounting; but he was one of those men who contribute to build up the greatness and glory of their country.

Mr. Marcus, in his excellent work on South Australia, published in 1876, which was reviewed at the time in the ACADEMY, gives so good a picture of Mr. Angas in relation to the colony which he helped to found, that it may not be out of place to quote it here. He writes:

"The first Commissioners found considerable difficulty in starting their scheme, and at one time there was a danger of the thing falling through and becoming a grand failure. To prevent this, Mr. George Fife Angas, one of the Commissioners, was largely instrumental in starting the South Australian Company, for the purchase of land and the settlement of a population on the land. Mr. Angas is one of the best and most useful colonists the province has ever had. He devoted time and labour to the colony when it needed the best assistance of its best friends. More than this, he risked to a large extent his considerable private means to give the province a start on a safe footing. This venerable gentleman still lives among us, and he has the satisfaction of seeing the prosperity of the community which he did so much to aid at first. In that prosperity, as was fitting, Mr. Angas greatly shared; and now, full of years, honours, and usefulness, he is spending the close of his days in the quietude of his beautiful Lindsay House—one of the loveliest spots in the whole colony. Whenever the history of South Australia is written, the name of George Fife Angas must occupy a prominent position in its records."

Mr. Angas died peacefully on May 15, 1879, at the age of ninety (his father had lived to be eighty-nine). He was not covetous of worldly honours; he had been offered and declined first a knighthood and then a baronetcy, for the important service he performed in 1841 in urging the government to take possession of New Zealand before the French. It is more than probable that without his energy the French would have won the race. Mr. Hodder is very far from being a model biographer;

but he has produced a book which may be recommended, and which will certainly have a large circulation in South Australia.

Tales of Two Countries. From the Norwegian of Alexander L. Kielland. Translated by William Archer. (Osgood, Mellvaine & Co.)

Only a Shadow. By D. Christie Murray and Henry Herman. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THERE is a charm in the books of Mr. Shorthouse which is always rare, and in present-day literature almost unique—the charm of glamour. Some of the old ballad-writers had it, De la Motte Fouqué had it, Rossetti had it; but now, outside of Mr. Shorthouse's romances, we are conscious of its presence only in a very few poems by Miss Christina Rossetti and Mrs. Hamilton King. Some writers seem to have thought to achieve it by a mere introduction of the super- or preter-natural; but this is always a failure, for nothing in literature is more deficient in genuine glamour than the ordinary story of ghostly apparitions or magical wonders. On occasion Mr. Shorthouse has utilised the supernatural element in the ordinary way, but with a difference: It is seldom essential to his purpose, and in Blanche, Lady Falaise he dispenses with it altogether. The effect of glamour is here achieved by the presentation of a human being whose life is lived in two worlds, a world of natural realities and a world of spiritual realities, and by a reversal of the proportions ordinarily borne by each life to the whole sum of existence. Lady Falaise's fixed idea of her spiritual responsibility for the moral ruin of Paul Damerle acts upon her as the knowledge of things behind the veil of death acted upon Lazarus in Browning's "Epistle of Karshish": the simple human life that was her's lies around her in ruins, and yet she cannot escape from it, for the stones once built into the fair edifice become stumbling blocks, presenting their sharp edges to her bleeding feet. The conception of a great and ultimately triumphant vicarious atonement, worked out in a terrible solitude by the innocent for the guilty, is in itself singularly noble and impressive; and yet it is impossible to regard Mr. Shorthouse's treatment of it as successful, because the special situation is not one which could enter into any normally healthy life. It is not merely that Lady Falaise suffers in her knowledge of Damerle's sin—such suffering, howsoever intense, might be realisable and credible: she suffers because she feels his guilt to be her own, and this feeling comes not of intense quickening of spiritual life, but rather of its perversion. She is a study in psychical pathology; her case, to put it bluntly, is one of mania, not of divinely illuminated perception; and therefore all the delicate beauty of Mr. Shorthouse's literary handling fails to produce its intended effect. The pages which precede this unsatisfactory presentation of a spiritual problem are perfect in their quiet grace and loveliness, and in the latter part of the book there are some of those passages of description in which Mr. Shorthouse brings before us not only the body but the very spirit of the scene described.

Miss Mary Angela Dickens has written a novel which does no discredit even to the distinguished name she bears. To say that Cross Currents is an exceptionally able maiden effort would be to damn it with faint or, at any rate, misleading praise; for in first novels, howsoever vigorous, graceful, or arresting they may be, there are almost always some half-dozen touches of crudity or indications of inexperience which testify to the workmanship of a 'prentice hand. There may be such things in Miss Dickens' story; but, at any rate, one reader who is not unused to following the trail of the amateur has failed to find them, and entertains a strong belief that they are not to be found. The general theme of the book—the conflict between the opposed claims of art and love—is not unfamiliar; but in Cross Currents it has all the freshness that can be given by an unhackneyed narrative structure, and by a group of portraits that have the lifelikeness only produced by the combined action of keen observation and creative power. Selma Malet, with her inborn histrionic instincts and her prospects of early and brilliant triumph, listens to the voice of love, by which all other voices are for the moment silenced. They might have been silenced for ever had Selma been left to herself. But John Tyrrell, whose protégée she has been in the days of her old ambition, crosses her path again; his iron will and persuasive tongue regain their domination; and a week before the day fixed for her marriage she deserts her betrothed with a despairing message of love, and returns to the life which she had thought belonged to a dead past. It cannot, however, be the old life over again; and there is real subtlety of insight in the story of poor Selma's gradual discovery that the new self which has become hers is not a thing which can be banished by putting it out of doors and turning the key. In the scientific, not the cant, sense of the word, Cross Currents is a novel of strong psychological interest, but there is no wearisome analysis of emotion. On the contrary, its substance might be described as a simple series of bright society sketches, drawn with fine skill and wide knowledge; and the stages of Selma's awakening are indicated by little touches which singly are little more than hints, but which in the aggregate tell the story with satisfying adequacy. Tyrrell, too, is a genuine success; and indeed the equality of excellence in Cross Currents is as uncommon as it is delightful.

In Love or Money Mrs. Henry Jenner has mainly devoted herself to painting with relentless vigour of delineation the portrait of a singularly fascinating girl who is absolutely devoid of a moral sense, and whose whims of selfishness or malice are restrained by nothing but an animal instinct of self-preservation. Whether Phil Ferrars is possible is a question which must, we hope, be answered in the negative; but in Mrs. Jenner's pages she is a creature who feels her life in every limb, and as we read we are compelled to believe in her, though there is something that is elfish rather than human in her seductive devilries. A good deal pleasanter and not one whit less clever than the figure of the lovely and wicked Phil is the opening sketch of the Ferrars family, of which she is the black sheep. Poor Mr. Ferrars, the vicar of a wild Cornish parish, with a broken-spirited wife, eleven young children, and a stipend rather under the wages of a capable mechanic, is a genuinely pathetic creation; and the ways and works of the juveniles, all named after saints of the primitive Church, leave no doubt whatever that Mrs. Jenner knows children well, and that among her many endowments a quick sense of humour holds a prominent place. Love or Money is beyond question a well-written and able novel.

Mrs. Barnett's story, Dr. and Mrs. Gold, gives one the impression of having been written with some kind of didactic purpose: at least, it seems impossible that it should have been written for entertainment pure and simple; but the nature of that purpose passes the wit of man to discover. That a young feminine revolutionist of good character, who is very much in earnest, makes an unfortunate mistake when she becomes the mistress of a masculine revolutionist of bad character, who is not at all in earnest, is the most important inference to be drawn from Mrs. Barnett's narrative; and though it may, perhaps, take rank as a "moral," it has too much of the quality of obviousness to provide a raison d'être for a story of nearly 300 pages. If, however, the characters in a work of fiction do not point a moral, they should at least adorn a tale; and in order to fulfil this requirement they should be beings of flesh and blood, which Clara David and Dr. Gold assuredly are not. Their individualities, their aims, and their motives are never made realisable to us; and, as a natural consequence, the drama in which they play their parts is simply a series of movements, the sequence of which seems altogether fortuitous.

A Reverend Gentleman is the very unedifying and not specially amusing story of the doings and misdoings—particularly the latter—of a clerical person who begins his recorded career as a Bohemian of the vulgarest sort, and ends it as a systematic swindler and forger. In his Bohemian days he wins a bet, made with a man young enough to be his son, by delivering to his Welsh congregation a chapter from Tristram Shandy instead of a sermon; and when this young man runs away with his daughter and induces her to live with him for a week prior to the formality of marriage, the middle-aged scamp regards the affair with a philosophical indifference which is positively nauseating. The virtuous pair have not long been legally united when the husband seduces, or is seduced by, a second young lady, for whom he deserts his wife, the latter being consoled by an annual allowance. The wife dies, but the reverend father continues to draw the allowance, giving receipts to which, of course, a forgery of his deceased daughter's signature is attached. Finally Nemesis overtakes him; and when Nemesis has done with him, Mr. Cobban relieves us from his objectionable presence. The book is not deficient in a certain common kind of cleverness; but it was not worth writing, and is certainly not worth reading.

Without any depreciation of the very bright and clever stories told by Mr. Brander Matthews and his literary partners, it may be said that With my Friends contains nothing more interesting than the introductory paper on "The Art and Mystery of Collaboration." Perhaps it would have been more interesting still had Mr. Matthews revealed those secrets of the workshop about which the reading public is specially curious; but so far as narrative fiction is concerned he is commendably discreet, though he tells us something of his experiences of collaboration in dramatic work. The half-dozen tales which follow are, for the most part, slight enough, but their very slightness emphasises the charm of their admirable workmanship. The new version of the old story of "The Three Wishes," told in partnership with Mr. Anstey, is specially entertaining; and "One Story is good till another is told" is full of bright, fresh humour.

Mr. William Archer's comparison of Alexander Kielland to Ibsen seems to be justified by three or four of the stories he has translated in Tales of Two Countries, which sound the now familiar notes of Ibsenite cynicism and pessimism. The intellectual power is unmistakable, and there is in the literary manner a reserved irony which is very effective as a means towards the desired ends of impression; but the pertinacious turning-up of the seamy side of life deprives the stories of all charm other than that given by a sort of relentless cleverness. Notwithstanding this, however, there are two or three short sketches, rather than tales, which in their sombre beauty prove that Mr. Archer does not miss the mark in speaking of Kielland as a poet.

Despite the highly respectable names upon its title-page, Only a Shadow is a mere pot-boiler, and—as the Americans say—poor at that. The story is improbable without the kind of interest sometimes secured by improbability, and there is nothing in the telling of it to make it attractive.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE,

RECENT THEOLOGY.

Gospel Criticism and Historical Christianity: A Study of the Gospels and of the History of the Gospel Canon during the Second Century, with a Consideration of the Results of Modern Criticism, by Orello Cone, D.D. (Putnam's Sons.) This is a very able and excellent summary, written in a thoroughly independent spirit, of the results of the criticism of the Gospels, and may be recommended as a successful attempt to present those results in a form that will be popularly intelligible. Dr. Cone begins with a chapter on the text, of a sufficiently elementary character, and then proceeds to trace, at considerable length, the growth of the New Testament canon. The main body of the work, however, is occupied with the Gospel problem proper: viz., the relation of the Synoptics to one another, and to the Fourth Gospel. Here Dr. Cone will be found favouring the opinion, now so widely received, which assigns the priority to Mark, and regards Mark's narrative, not necessarily in its present form—for some passages betray their secondary character—but, if not, in some simpler form, as one of the chief sources of the canonical first and third Gospels, the other being the Logia collection of the apostle Matthew. Of Luke's direct use of the canonical Matthew, he finds but few evidences. Dr. Cone discusses at some length the authenticity of the Gospel according to John, and sums up very ably and even eloquently on the negative side. Besides the differences with the Synoptics, a strong point is made of the author's affinity with the Pauline theology, which he even surpasses in his universalism. It is not denied, however, that the tradition which connects the Gospel with John the Apostle has a certain validity; and the conclusion arrived at is that the writer's "relation to John is somewhat analogous to that of the first Evangelist to Matthew, though he doubtless handled his materials with much greater freedom than the latter." That Dr. Cone does not write as an apologist, or as in any sense maintaining the inerrancy or even thorough historical credibility of the records, is still further apparent from a chapter on the eschatology of the Gospels, in which he discards as quite unworthy of Christ the discourse prophetic of the end of the world and the coming judgment. It was Paul, he maintains, who first invested the Messiah with judicial functions, and the discourse concerning the last things was evidently the product of the stress that came upon the Church at the siege of Jerusalem. Nevertheless, Dr. Cone evidently wishes to be regarded as writing in a constructive spirit. Criticism, which he aptly points out the Evangelists themselves exercised, must have its full rights. But after criticism has spoken its last word, there will still remain, in the ancient records of Christianity, much that is of imperishable value. Dr. Cone's work, while popular in style, is at the same time scholarly in character. The author seems to be well read in the literature of his subject; but he certainly ought not to have been ignorant of the recent "find" of Tatian's Diatessaron, nor to have written as if the nature of that work were still conjectural.

Antichrist: A Short Examination of the Spirit of the Age. By F. W. Bain. (Parker.) It is difficult for a critic to do justice to a book which he finds irritating from cover to cover. Mr. Bain starts from the position that the French Revolution was "not necessary." The "movement so ticketed . . . included a Reform and a Revolution"; the Reform according to Mr. Bain was necessary and national, the Revolution was essentially sectional. Mr. Bain then proceeds to attack the "visionary theorists" who pursue "ideal standards of comfort," and to insist that the Revolution, in so far as the theorists had anything to do with it, was unmixed evil. We are reminded of a recent demand for "Lamb's not Coleridge's," though Mr. Bain makes it with much less reason or restraint than the author of Obiter Dicta. The irritating thing about Mr. Bain is that he does not seem to perceive that he is continually answering himself. "A whole people never did, and never will, aim at positive abstract ideals." That is either a libel on a "whole people," or a justification of the visionary theorists. Is Mr. Bain so blind as not to perceive that his whole chapter might be summed up as a dis-suasive against seeking first the Kingdom of God. What he says has its value when applied to ordinary men and ordinary duties; but as criticism of Christ, and the code of courageous endeavour Christ sanctions, it is futile. Mr. Bain's "visionary theorist" hopes to bring the "whole people" up to his own level; and abhors the disdain for the crowd which lurks behind Mr. Bain's dislike of those who stir crowds up. Mr. Bain very much astonishes us by winding up his attack upon "Rationalistic Liberal Republicanism" with a panegyric on Lord Beaconsfield, who was "the Incarnate Protest" against all that is evil in modern civilisation. Next to Scott's, "Disraeli's novels are the finest in the English language." We are not disposed to deride Mr. Bain's enthusiasm, because we are agreeably surprised that he can be enthusiastic. His tone is so invariably bitter and disdainful that to find him bending the knee at any shrine is a relief. We fear that his book will generally only irritate those whom it attacks; but if "Rationalistic Liberals" can possess their souls in patience while they read, they will find much witty and acute criticism in Mr. Bain's splenetic essay. His main idea that abstract theory is useless and mischievous in politics is clearly a paradox; but if we understand him to mean that political progress and growth can be secured only by patient study of men and nations as they are, we can find ourselves almost at one with him.

The Church of Scotland Past and Present: its History; its relation to Law and the State; its Doctrine, Ritual, Discipline, and Patrimony. Edited by R. H. Story. Vol. III., The Church from the Revolution to the Present Time, by T. B. W. Niven; Vol. IV., The Church in its Relation to the Law and the State, by A. MacGeorge; and The Doctrine of the Church of Scotland, by A. Milroy. (William Mackenzie.) This is a continuation of the work of which the first two volumes have been already noticed. The volumes before us, as dealing with modern and recent times, exhibit more clearly that this is Scottish Church history, not merely from a Presbyterian, but from an Established Church view point. Without expressing any opinion of the manner in which the Disruption epoch is dealt with, we can commend Vol. iii. as giving an entertaining and lucid account of such obscure subjects as the "Marrow" controversy, the rise of the "Associate Presbytery," the "Burghers" and "Antiburghers," and the other off-shoots from the Established Church. Dr. Milroy's contribution to Vol. iv. is full of interest, and gives a vivid account of the "revolution in Scottish theology" effected within the last thirty years. The editor does not seem to have thought it necessary in all instances to harmonise the views of the several contributors. Thus in Vol. iv. Mr. MacGeorge tells us that the bishop in the Celtic Church "being subject to the abbot, his episcopate was only a personal dignity" (p. 4), while Dr. Milroy declares that it was "the exclusive privilege of the bishops to ordain presbyters and deacons" (p. 140).

Die Klagelieder des Jeremias. Erklärt von Dr. Max Lohr. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.) A dissertation on a subject which has not been handled lately. The philology of the commentary presents little that is novel, but much that will repay study. The dissertation is no mere compilation, but represents independent work. No part of the little book of kinóth is post-Exilic. The central portion (chaps. ii.-iv.) was written first, chaps. i. and v. having been added to make the work suitable for use in the congregation. This is probable from differences of external force, from the want of a clear logical arrangement, from the poverty of contents, and from the differences of the speakers.

Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum A. T.: Hiob. Von A. Dillmann. (Leipzig: Hirzel.) The second revised edition of Dillmann's Job will be heartily welcomed by Hebrew students. It is sedulously brought up to date; and if the learned and judicious commentator prefers his own familiar and well-tested solutions to those of younger and more "advanced" critics, few will regard this as a fault. Prof. George Hoffmann's exegetical novelties find the notice which is due, less to their intrinsic probability in general, than to the eminence of the author as a Semitic scholar.

The Children's Pulpit. By Rev. J. R. Howatt. (Nisbet.) In addressing children from the pulpit, terse directions and plain narratives reverently told make more impression than emotional, not to say sentimental, discourses. Mr. Howatt's fifty short sermons make too many calls upon the feelings to be quite healthy addresses to the young; while they are also unusually colloquial. Tom the Sailor, and Miss Scroggs, Katie and her dish-cover, do not commend themselves to ordinary minds as topics suited to the pulpit at any time.

MR. HENRY FROWDE and Messrs. C. J. Clay & Sons—on behalf of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, who are the joint owners of the copyright—have issued three new editions of the Revised Version of the Bible, all printed on India paper and bound in morocco. The sizes are royal octavo, octavo, and 16mo; and the corresponding types are pica, minion, and ruby. The largest of the three has as many as 2688 pages, but yet forms a comparatively light volume; the other two, though they have an appendix of maps and index, are each compressed into less than 1000 pages. The printing, even of the smallest, is perfectly clear; but we cannot add that the paper is absolutely opaque.

The volume of The Church Monthly for 1891 (Church Monthly office), is as varied and excellent as ever. The number for January, 1892—which is published in advance—continues the promise with which this periodical began its course.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that Mrs. Sutherland Orr is preparing a reply to certain criticisms of her Life and Letters of Robert Browning, which will appear shortly in one of the leading monthlies.

LORD ROSEBURY'S Life of Pitt will be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., in their series of "Twelve English Statesmen," at the beginning of next week.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will publish shortly an English translation of Major H. von Wissman's Second Journey through Equatorial Africa, from the Congo to the Zambesi, made in the years 1886 and 1887. The volume will have nearly one hundred illustrations, and a map by Mr. F. S. Weller.

NOTES and Impressions of a five years' sojourn in the Argentine Republic, by Mr. Thomas A. Turner, will shortly be issued by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. The book will be illustrated with portraits of those who took a part in the late revolution, and with views of many places of interest.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN is about to publish a memoir of Behramji M. Malabari, the Indian author and philanthropist, known for his earnest labours against infant marriage and the wrongs of the Hindu widow, his best known work being Gujarat and the Gujaratis. The volume will have an introduction from the pen of Miss Florence Nightingale; the biographer is the Hon. Dayaram Gidumal, acting District-Judge at Shikarpur.

MESSRS. CASSELL & COMPANY will shortly publish a new work by Mr. H. O. Arnold Forster, entitled This World of Ours, being an introduction to the study of geography, with numerous illustrations specially prepared for the book. Mr. Arnold Forster's Citizen Reader has already reached a sale of 175,000 and his Laws of Everyday Life has passed through several editions.

MR. JOHN HEYWOOD will publish early in the new year a Manual of Continuation Schools and Technical Instruction, by Mr. C. H. Wyatt, clerk to the Manchester School Board.

One of the next volumes of the "Adventure Series" will be The Life and Adventures of James B. Beckwourth, Mountaineer, Scout, Pioneer, and Chief of the Crow Indians, edited by Mr. Charles G. Leland.

DR. AVELING, whose analysis of the writings of Charles Darwin is well known, has just completed a similar analysis of the first volume of Karl Marx' Capital ("Capitalist Production"). It will be published in Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.'s "Social Science Series."

MESSRS. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. will publish in a few days Bygone Northamptonshire, edited by Mr. William Andrews, of Hull. It will include chapters on the history, folk-lore, and memorable men and women of the county, by local authors, together with numerous illustrations.

A VOLUME of Highland tales and legends, by Mrs. A. Mackenzie, many of which originally appeared in the Celtic Magazine and the Scottish Highlander, will be published early in January next.

MESSRS. D. C. HEATH & Co., of Boston, will issue shortly a beginner's book in Old English by Mr. George Hempel, professor of English in the University of Michigan. It will consist of elementary grammar and easy texts, suitable as introductory to advanced grammar and reading.

THE first edition of Mr. J. M. Barrie's novel, The Little Minister, has already been exhausted; a second edition is now in preparation, which will be ready next week.

A NEW edition is announced of Seyffert's Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, edited by Prof. Nettleship and Dr. Sandys, which was published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. last April. It will contain some further references to Aristotle's "Constitution of Athens," and a complete index of both subjects and illustrations.

A SECOND and revised edition of Mr. James M. Sutherland's Story of William Wordsworth is announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. announce that Barker's Facts and Figures for 1892, revised and brought down to date, will be published immediately. Special features of the forthcoming issue will be the addition of a Census supplement, and also an Elections supplement, giving the results of the general elections in 1885 and 1886, and of all the bye-elections.

THE forthcoming volume of Hazell's Annual, to be published in the first week of December, will contain an exhaustive article on "State Pensions." Special attention has also been given to the new developments of education, such as technical training and continuation schools; and the number of biographies, always a prominent feature of this publication, has been largely augmented.

MR. W. M. ROSSETTI, as chairman of a committee of the Shelley Society formed to commemorate the centenary of the poet's birth, has issued an appeal for subscriptions of one guinea towards a guarantee fund of £100, to be devoted to giving, in a worthy manner, a private performance of "The Cenci" in May of next year. Mr. Rossetti's address is 3, St. Edmund's-terrace, Primrose-hill, N.W.

THE Browning Society's monthly meeting will be held at University College, Gower-street, on Thursday next, November 20, when a dramatic reading of "The Return of the Druses" will be given, under the direction of Miss Esther Defries and Mr. Frank Murray.

ON Thursday and Friday of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged in selling a most interesting collection of autograph letters, brought together from various quarters. They comprise Blackstone's assignment of his Commentaries for £1097, besides (apparently) £3200 for an edition of 514 copies; an elaborate defence of Clarissa Harlowe by Richardson; two long letters of Warren Hastings, giving an account of public affairs, and also of his private circumstances, during the obscure period of his first sojourn in India; four of Keats's letters to Fanny Brawne; two of Byron's to Hodgson; several relating to Charlotte Brontë; and important letters of Cowper, Coleridge, Lamb, Carlyle, Dickens, and Mrs. Browning. At the end are a number that had been addressed by literary people to the late W. F. Dallas and the late W. R. S. Ralston.

WITH reference to the note, in the ACADEMY of last week, upon the Supplement to Allibone which Messrs. Lippincott have just issued, Mr. Ernest Radford writes to us:

"May I suggest that Messrs. Lippincott are perhaps going rather too fast than too slow; for without consulting me they have placed me in that Supplement as having been born in 1853, and as having graduated from Pembroke College, Cambridge. In fact, I was born in 1857, and was of Trinity Hall."

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE first fruits of Sir Edwin Arnold's poetic musings in the Land of the Rising Sun will appear in the December number of the Contemporary Review, under the title "The 'No' Dance." The poem, which is of some length, embodies in a form at once lyrical and dramatic a charming Japanese legend.

THE next number of The Bookman will contain a series of letters on the question whether literary men should be recognised by the State, by Lord Selborne, Prof. Max Müller, Prof. Tyndall, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Lecky, and other well-known writers; also, Reminiscences of John Morley; and an article on Thomas Hardy by Prof. Minto. A plate will be presented containing portraits of two American authoresses—Miss Mary E. Wilkins, and Miss Sara Jeanette Duncan.

PROF. SAYCE has written for the December number of the Newbery House Magazine an article entitled "The King of Salem," dealing in a popular manner with some of the results of the Tel el-Amarna discoveries. Among the other contents will be "The Future of Religious Education in Elementary Schools," by Dean Gregory; "China and its Future," by the Rev.

R. Brooks Egan; and a review of Christmas books, by Mrs. L. B. Walford.

St. Nicholas for December will contain a sketch by Bill Nye, entitled "The Escape of the Whole Menagerie."

THE next issue of Sunday Words will appear in an enlarged form. Among other attractive features will be two serials—"Giovanni and the Other," by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, and "The Head of the Firm," by Mrs. J. H. Riddell.

YET another sixpenny monthly is announced—the Albion Review, to be edited jointly by Messrs. W. H. Wilkins and Mr. Hubert Crackanthorpe, and to be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein. Its leading feature is stated to be "the promotion of individual independence of thought," contributors being free to express their views on all kinds of subjects, irrespective of sect, clique, or party. It will consist of signed articles and short stories, by foreign as well as English writers. There will also be occasional illustrations. Mr. Whistler has promised one of his "Songs on Stone" for the first number, which will appear on December 16.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

LORD WALSHINGHAM, the newly-elected High Steward at Cambridge has offered to give annually for three years a gold medal for the best monograph or essay giving evidence of original research in any subject coming under the cognisance of the special board for biology and geology. It is proposed that the competition be confined to Bachelors of Arts of not more than two years' standing from inauguration.

THE death is announced at Clevedon, on November 10, of Henry Nottidge Moseley, Linacre professor of human and comparative anatomy at Oxford. He was only forty-six years of age. None of the younger generation of science students at Oxford had a more brilliant career, which included an experience of four years on board the Challenger, during her famous voyage round the world. Of this he wrote a popular narrative, as well as several scientific memoirs. The highest hopes were entertained when he was elected, in 1881, to succeed Prof. Rolleston, his former teacher at Oxford; but shortly afterwards his health entirely broke down. For some time Dr. Hickson, of Cambridge, lectured for him; but two years ago his friend, Prof. Ray Lankester, was appointed to be his permanent deputy.

THE late Prof. Thorold Rogers's last work will be published shortly by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, under the title of The Industrial and Commercial History of England. It consists of lectures delivered at Oxford, which were heard by only a few. The work is edited, with an introduction, by the professor's son, Mr. Arthur G. L. Rogers.

THE University of Cambridge proposes to confer the honorary degree of Doctor in Law upon Mr. F. W. Maitland, who has been Downing professor of law since 1888, and who is known to the public by the treatises on early English law and manorial customs which he has edited for the Selden Society.

The Hon. and Rev. A. T. Lyttelton, Master of Selwyn's, has chosen as the subject of his Hulsean Lectures at Cambridge; "The Place of Miracles in Christianity."

MR. W. M. ROSSETTI has been invited by the curators of the Taylorian Institution to deliver a public lecture at Oxford upon "Leopardi," on Tuesday next, November 24.

DR. WRIGHT, deputy professor of comparative philology at Oxford, will deliver a public lecture on Saturday next, November 28, upon "The Operation of the Laws of Sound-Change."

THE Choragus at Oxford (Dr. C. H. H. Parry) will deliver two public lectures in the Sheldonian Theatre, on November 26 and December 3, upon "Music for Viols of the Seventeenth Century," and "Lulli and the Beginnings of the French Opera."

PROF. W. P. KER, of University College, London, was to deliver a lecture to-day (Saturday), at Oxford, on behalf of the Association for the Education of Women, upon "Epic Poetry and Romance in Early English Literature."

THE music which Dr. C. H. Lloyd has written for the performance of "The Frogs" of Aristophanes at Oxford next term is already in course of rehearsal.

A MEMORIAL, signed by 2689 persons resident in New Zealand and interested in education, has been presented to the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, praying that the University may provide for the admission of properly qualified women to degrees. The memorial is grounded upon a recent case of hardship, in which a lady engaged in teaching in New Zealand, who holds a certificate of having passed the Moral Sciences' Tripos, finds herself disqualified for the highest posts in the education department through not possessing an actual degree.

THE University of Cambridge has made grants of certain books printed at the University Press to the following free public libraries: Bethnal Green, Blackburn, Camberwell, Clerkenwell, Hammernsmith, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Stoke Newington, and Wolverhampton.

WE take this means of calling the attention of the authorities of New College, Oxford, to the fact that on Monday next, November 23, Messrs. Sotheby will offer for sale a fine copy of the editio princeps of Diogenes Laertius (Basel, 1533), which has written on its title-page the following inscription: "Liber Collegii bte Marie Winton in Oxon." Surely they will try to recover it for the college library.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A FLIGHT FROM HEAVEN.

(Suggested by Mrs. Graham Tomson's beautiful sonnet "Hereafter.")

ONCE, from the parapet of gems and glow,
An Angel said, "O God, the heart grows cold,
On these eternal battlements of gold,
Where all is pure, but cold as virgin snow.
Here sobs are never heard; no salt tears flow;
Here there are none to help—nor sick nor old;
No wrong to fight, no justice to uphold;
Grant me thy leave to live man's life below."
"And then annihilation?" God replied.
"Yes," said the Angel, "even that dread price:
For earthly tears are worth eternal night."
"Then go," said God.—The Angel opened wide
His dazzling wings, gazed back on Heaven thrice,
And plunged for ever from the walls of Light.

EUGENE LEE HAMILTON.

IN MEMORIAM.

PRINCE LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE.

IT was away from home that I heard of the lamented death of Prince L.-L. Bonaparte; but I hope that the ACADEMY will yet give me space to record my grateful sense of his unvarying help and kindness to an unknown student, when first grappling with the difficulties of the Basque question. I know also that he generously assisted others, not only with information which he alone could procure, but also with gifts of his costly publications, and this at a time when he was far from wealthy. On whatever subject I applied to him for aid he always answered me fully and promptly. Whether it were for the identification of a plant, or the etymology of a word, or the explanation of some grammatical puzzle, his reply was always speedy, and to the point; and this even when forced to complain of increasing difficulty in writing.

What the Prince did in Basque represents but a small part of his studies. He had more than a smattering of natural history, which he learned from his elder brother. He alludes to this in his Names of European Reptiles in the Living Neo-Latin Languages, printed in 1884. He had so little of the bigot in him, where anything connected with philology was concerned, that he did much and most useful work for the British and Foreign Bible Society. As a phonetician he had rare personal gifts (aural and vocal). It was amusing to hear of the contests in phonetic skill between him and his friend, M. Antoine d'Abbadie, of the Institute—the latter challenging him to reproduce some rare African "click," and the Prince distinguishing between minute changes, or remarking on similarities, which the other had scarcely observed. They were well-matched; but M. d'Abbadie acknowledged that the Prince had the finer ear.

Prince L.-L. Bonaparte took the utmost advantage of his position under the Second Empire to make a progress through the whole of the Basque-speaking provinces, examining and conversing with peasants on the spot in all the different dialects, with the assistance of the best native scholars, with whom he continued intercourse till the end. Of his chief helpers, Salaberry and Captain Duvoisin are dead; Canon Inchauspe still lives in retirement. Younger scholars have taken up the work which he was the first to place on a thoroughly scientific footing. So well indeed has that work been done, that probably the interest of the Basque question will in future be rather ethnological and anthropological than linguistic.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THIS is a very good number of The Antiquary, but the editor has aimed at too much. The large number of articles has compelled him to cut several of them down to unreasonably narrow dimensions. Mr. W. H. St. John Hope has communicated a very useful account of the Silchester excavations which have been carried on at the cost of Mr. Freshfield, treasurer of the Society of Antiquaries, and the late Mr. Walter Foster. The foundations of many shops and dwelling-houses have been come upon. Among the animal remains discovered was the skeleton of a small fish, which had been carefully buried in an earthen jar, and covered with a flint-stone. Mr. Hope thinks that it had been its owner's pet, and we are inclined to agree with him; but another view is not untenable—it may have been buried for purposes of magic, as the hearts of hares and other small animals are known to have been in recent times. Mr. George Bailey has written an interesting account, accompanied by an illustration, of a wall-painting which was discovered in the Lichfield chapter-house upwards of thirty years ago. It is much defaced, but when perfect it must have been a very pleasing work of art. It represents the Assumption. The Blessed Virgin is vested in a royal robe, ornamented with gems. An orb of angels surrounds the ascending figure; below are green hills, on which are kneeling figures intended to represent the canons of the church. It appears to have been made out with a near approach to certainty that this interesting picture was executed for Thomas Heywood, the dean in 1482. The Rev. G. Hennessy contributes some interesting notes from the ecclesiastical registers of the diocese of London. The account of the Folk-lore Congress is not signed; it is the best we have seen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"CONTENT," "CONTENTS."

Oxford: Nov. 14, 1891.

Allow me to express my hearty thanks to the many readers of the ACADEMY who have so kindly complied with my request for information as to their accentuation of content and contents in various senses. Additional thanks are due to those who have not only answered for themselves, but have collected answers on a large scale from others, especially to the Rev. J. T. Fowler of Durham, who has sent me sixty answers from clergymen, professors, and students, and to Mr. Alexander Beazeley, F.R.I.B.A., who has sent me an abstract of fifty-six answers collected by himself; also to several professors and schoolmasters who have tested whole classes of students and upper forms in public schools. Special thanks are also due to the unknown benefactor who had the test-sentences printed or type-written at his or her own expense on postcards addressed to me, and circulated these widely among university professors and lecturers.

As the result of all these efforts 341 answers have been sent to me direct; and Mr. Beazeley has collected 56 more, making 397 in all. These answers come from educated men and women of all classes, including many well-known scholars, authors, church-dignitaries, clergymen, professors, and graduates. They reveal the contemporary existence of at least fourteen varieties of pronunciation in the four sentences given, and show that if I had added in the ACADEMY a sentence containing "contents-bill" there would have been one or two more varieties. To come to the figures. Of the 341 individual accounts that have reached me—

150 say content, contents in all cases.

100 say content, contents in all cases.

91 vary the stress according to the sense. (But of the 250 several do not know the expression "ethic content," and answer only by analogy or leave it unnoted.) The 91 exhibit nearly every possible kind of permutation and combination, though the bulk of them fall under six heads.

20 say contents in all cases, except the contents of a pocket, purse, pie, &c.

18 say contents always in the plural, but cubic content, ethic content.

16 say contents of a book, but contents in all other cases.

11 say contents in all cases, except ethic content.

7 say contents in all cases, except ethic content.

7 say contents of a book, ethic content, but contents of a pocket, cubic content.

The remaining 12 fall into 6 little groups of from 3 down to 1 person, and are more or less instances of individual eccentricity:

3 say contents plural, and content singular.

3 say contents in all cases, except in contents of a book.

2 say contents, everywhere except in cubic content.

2 say content of a book, and cubic content, but contents of pocket and ethic content.

1 says contents of a book and ethic content, elsewhere contents.

1 says contents of a book, but contents in all other cases.

Summing these up in another way, and adding Mr. Beazeley's results, which have reached me only in this form, we find that of 397 persons—

Contents of a book is said by 208, contents by 189.

Contents of pocket by 260, contents by 137.

Cubic content by 222, content by 175.

Ethic content by 201, content by 165.

In the case of this latter, I have omitted 31 who either answer only by analogy or are doubtful from having never heard or used the phrase.

There is thus a decided though, except in the case of "contents of a pocket," not overwhelming majority for the historical pronunciation content. Looking at the quality of the answers, however, apart from their number, one cannot but be struck by the fact that on the whole the weight of authority is strongly in favour of this pronunciation; it is that of the great majority of those men to whose pronunciation one would look for a standard. This agrees also with a note appended to his answer by Dr. Fitzedward Hall, author of Modern English and many other works on the niceties of English usage, who says: "Some ten years ago, as I satisfied myself that the most careful speakers stressed contents on the last syllable, I adopted their pronunciation." The fact is also apparent, though not as much so as personal observation in Oxford had led me to expect, that on the whole contents belongs to an older or more adult stratum. Few elderly men among my correspondents say contents; many are not conscious of having ever heard it. But, whereas, after personal experiment in my own family and in several other families in Oxford, I had been disposed to draw the conclusion that all parents say content and all children content, those correspondents who tried classes or forms of boys in the public schools did not at all find this borne out. Thus, in a form of 21 boys at Westminster School between the ages of 15 and 17, the master found 13 contents against 8 contents, almost exactly the same ratio as I find among my whole correspondents. In this case the master himself says content singular, contents plural, and was surprised to find that not one of the boys pronounced like him. On the other hand, in a private boarding-school in the north, in a class of 13 boys there were found 7 contents against 5 contents, and one who varied in different senses. Another thing very evident is that contents is much more common in the provinces than in London or at the universities. My Lancashire correspondents say contents almost unanimously in all senses, and most of them have no suspicion of the existence of any other pronunciation. Nothing is more amusing than the proofs which some of my answers afford, of a fact noted long ago, by Dr. A. J. Ellis, that people are often deaf to all pronunciations except their own. A much esteemed correspondent, a literary man, resident in Surrey, was "quite astounded" on reading my inquiry, having never in all his life (70 years old) heard anybody say anything but content. An M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge, says content, and has "never heard anyone, young or old, accent the word otherwise." But the same post brought a card from another Cambridge M.A., who never had heard anything but contents. A well-known Cambridge scholar, whom I asked to collect information from his own circle, says: "We all say contents; we fancy we have heard contents, but think it must be obsolete." Others who say contents, "have certainly heard contents," but only from "the half-educated," or "Americans," or "Irishmen," or "thought it merely an error." On the other hand, a Lancashire D.D. has "never heard from educated people any pronunciation but content, contents." Not many answers have come from America; but a professor from Ohio answers for himself and a colleague, and says that, "so far as I can judge, the prevalent educated accentuation, both in New England and Ohio, is on the first syllable." In several cases some of my male correspondents now find that their wives pronounce differently from themselves, a fact which they had never observed before. Another fact of which I am assured is that printers say contents of a book and (esp.) contents- bill, and have done so within the memory of some printers' readers for more than fifty years: but some of them look upon this as technical, and say contents in all other cases, or at least say contents of a pocket. The variety of contents in plural, with solid or ethnic content in singular, is interesting to me personally, because it was my habit as a boy (at least I said cubic or solid content, and should by analogy have done the same with ethnic content); but after I began to teach, my head master hearing me one day speak of "cubic content," denounced it as a Scotticism, not to be tolerated in a teacher of English; and as I found the pronouncing dictionaries favoured content, I adopted this, and have now for many years said content contents in all cases. The case of "ethnic content" is curious, in that a very large number of correspondents have boggled over this phrase; but still more curious in that men who know it well have opposite usages in regard to it. Several Oxford students of philosophy say "content in all cases," except "ethnic content," and several others, also Oxford philosophers, say content in all cases, but make an exception in "ethnic content."

Looking at the matter historically, we know that content, contents (L. contētum, contētū) is the original pronunciation, as evidenced alike by the poets and the orthoepists. But Walker, a hundred years ago, found that contents, "when it signifies the matter contained in a book, was often heard with the accent on the first syllable"; to this, however, he did not give his sanction, nor have the pronouncing dictionaries recognised contents until very recently; in Webster's table of usage in appears first in Worcester in 1860; I find it in Worcester of 1846 as a variant. The facts and figures given above show how long a variety of usage may exist, and thus give an actual instance of the rate and way in which pronunciation has often changed. If a similar census had been taken in the year 1391 of one of the French words that changed their stress between the fourteenth and sixteenth century, probably similar results would have been found. And it would have been of unspeakable use to English phonology if any one had tried to collect about 1600 the pronunciations of such a word as knight, with its evanishing k and gh and its lengthening i. Our present results are much less important; still, posterity may be glad of them, and I propose therefore to have the answers bound up, and to deposit them in the Bodleian Library, as an authentic specimen of the variations of English educated pronunciation in the end of the nineteenth century.

J. A. H. MURRAY.

CONFUSION OF JOHN, JONA, JONAS, AND JONAH IN THE AUTHORISED AND REVISED VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Sydenham-hill: Oct. 23, 1891.

This confusion occurs in Matt. xvi. 17, as compared with John i. 42, xxi. 15, 16, 17. The Greek in the version adopted by the A.V. is in Matt. xvi. 17, Σίμων βῆρ Ἰωάνᾱ ("Simon Bar-Jona"); in John i. 42, Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάνᾱ ("Simon the son of Jona"); and in John xxi. 15, 16, 17, Σίμων Ἰωάνᾱ ("Simon [son] of Jonas"). The Greek adopted by the R.V. is, in Matt. xvi. 17, the same as in the A.V., but they render Jonah instead of Jona. In John i. 42, xxi. 15, 16, 17, the revisers have adopted Ἰωάννου instead of Ἰωάνᾱ, and translate "Simon the son of John." My endeavour will be to show that Ἰωάνᾱ in these passages is probably merely a corrupted form, which would have been more correctly written Ἰωάνᾱ, and really means "of John."

John, in Hebrew, is יהוֹחָנָן (Jehochānān, 2 Chron. xvii. 15, xxiii. 1, &c.), frequently shortened into יוֹחָנָן (Jochānān, 1 Chron. iii. 15, xii. 4, 12, &c.). In the Sept. (Stier and Theile), this latter and later form is transliterated Ἰωανᾱν in 1 Chron. iii. 15, xii. 4; but, in xii. 12, it is Ἰωανᾱ, though there is another reading Ἰωανᾱν. In the Vulgate, in all three places, it is Johanan. Now, the form Ἰωανᾱ would naturally be taken to be either the acc. of Ἰωάνᾱ, for in 1 Chron. 5, 36, there is Ἰωανᾱν in the acc. with Ἰωανᾱν as another reading, and, in the following verse, there is Ἰωανᾱς in the nom. with Ἰωάνᾱς as another reading; or as the acc. of Ἰωάν, for יוֹחָנָן (= John) in the nom. is thus rendered in the Sept. in 2 Kings xxv. 23. The very form of the nom., Ἰωανᾱ(ν)ης, shows that Ἰωανᾱν was apt to be looked upon as the acc.; for how else can we explain the termination ης? and, in Macc. ii. 2 (Fritzsche, 1871), we have Ἰωανᾱης, with a note "vulgo Ἰωανᾱν," the form found in Jer. xl. 8, 13, with the accent penultimate, however, though it is Ἰωανᾱν in Jer. xli. 11, and Ἰωανᾱν in Ezra x. 6. The change of accent from the ultimate, as in Hebrew, to the penultimate in some of these forms will be noticed. Ἰωανᾱν (Jonathan) was also apparently sometimes looked upon as an acc.; for though this is, I believe, the form constantly found in all cases in the Sept., the noms. Ἰωανᾱς and Ἰωανᾱης are found in other books (see Smith's Dictionary of the Bible s. vv. Jonathan and Jonathas).

As for the Hebrew יוֹחָנָן (Jonah), it seems to have become Ἰωάνᾱς (Jonas) in Greek instead of Ἰωάνᾱ, because as is much more common as a masculine ending of proper names than a. Similarly, we find Horatias (Isaiah and Esaias) and Jeremias (Jeremiah), in which names, as in Jonah, the as represents the Hebrew יוֹחָ (ah). With regard to Judah, we find both Ἰουδᾱς (e.g., Gen. xxxv. 23, xxxviii. 15, 23) and Ἰουδᾱ (e.g., Gen. xlix. 9, Judg. i. 2, 3, 4). If there is any distinction between them, Ἰουδᾱς would seem to be used rather of persons or of the tribe personified, Ἰουδᾱ rather of the tribe, and I believe also of the land occupied by the tribe. But I do not find an example in which Ἰουδᾱ in this sense is used in the nominative, though we sometimes find Ἰουδαία, as in Is. iii. 8 (Vulg. Juda) and Jer. xiv. 2 (Vulg. Judaea). In the New Testament I think Ἰουδᾱς is to be found always used of persons only; and, indeed, Judas has been adopted in the A.V. of persons, including the son of Jacob, while Judah (more commonly Judea) is retained for the land. But, in the R.V., Judas has been changed back to Judah in the case of Jacob's son, but has been left elsewhere. The Vulg. uses Judas and Juda also; but there are cases in which Judas corresponds, not to Ἰουδᾱς, as it generally does, but to Ἰουδᾱ (e.g., Judg. i. 2, 3, 4, 10, 17); while there are others in which Juda corresponds to Ἰουδᾱς (e.g., 2 Kings xiv. 10, 12, Jer. xxiii. 6, Ps. lx. 9, cviii. 9). Does this disagreement represent a difference of views, or is there no explanation for it? In Hebrew there is but one form for persons, the tribe, and the land, viz., יְהוּדָה (Jehudah = Judah).

Hebrew proper names in נֶזֶר have also sometimes become as in Greek. Thus נֶזֶרַיָּ (Ezra) has become Ἐσδρας (with an intrusive δ) in the title of the book; but, in the book itself, in x. 1, 5, 6, 10, there is Ἐζρας, as there is also in Neh. viii. 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 15; while, in Neh. xii. 1, 33, there is Ἐζρα. But, in all these passages, with the exception, perhaps, of Neh. xii. 1, there is a second reading, Ἐσδρας. The Vulgate has Esdras and Esdra. As for the intrusive δ, which is met with also in one reading in 1 Chron. xxvii. 26, in Ἐσδρί = Ἐζרי (Ezri), I suppose that it was found to facilitate the pronunciation.

As for the form, βῆρ Ἰωάνᾱ, there are several other names in the New Testament compounded with the Hebrew word βῆρ = son - e.g., Βαρισηοῦς (Acts xiii. 6), Βαραβῆς (John xviii. 40), Βαρνάβας (Acts xii. 25), Βαραβᾱς (Acts i. 23, but not found in nom.), Βαρθολομαῖος (Matt. x. 3), and Βαρτίμαῖος (Mark x. 46); and it will be observed that they are often written as one word. But in all these cases the name following βῆρ is, in the text at least, put in the nom., in accordance with the supposed Hebrew practice, though there can be little doubt but that in prehistoric times, when Hebrew nouns had case-endings, the genitive would have been used as it still is in literary Arabic; while in βῆρ Ἰωάνᾱ, the Ἰωάνᾱ is the gen. of Ἰωάνᾱς, and is governed by βῆρ; and, in the case of Βαρισηοῦς, there are two other readings, Βαρισηοῦ (gen.) and Βαρισηοῦν (sic) in the acc. Now, Ἰωάνᾱς is used in the O.T. = Jonah (e.g., Jonah i. 3, 5, &c.); and so it has come about that the revisers of the N.T. have thought right to render βῆρ Ἰωάνᾱ Bar-Jonah, their object having been, probably in part at any rate, to assimilate the βῆρ Ἰωάνᾱ to the other compounds of βῆρ in which the name follows in the nom. But I am afraid they had another object also, and that was to show that they believed the name of Simon's father to have been uncertain, and that he was sometimes called John, and sometimes Jonas: else, why did they in John i. 42 add to their note on the name "John" in the text, "called in Matt. xvi. 17 Jonah"? If they really believed the Jonah to be = John (cf. our Jack, really = Jacob, but always used of John), would it not have been better to have added nothing in John i. 42, and in Matt. xvi. 17 to have put upon their Bar-jonah some such note as this, "i.e., 'son of Jonah,' Jonah being used for John"? But, if they considered Jonah (= Ἰωάνᾱς = Jonas) to be in this passage quite a distinct name, then I must say that I do not agree with them. The fact that in John i. 42, xxi. 15, 16, 17, there are two readings Ἰωάννου and Ἰωάνᾱ may of course be understood to signify that the name of Simon's father was not certainly known; but it is at least equally well susceptible of the explanation that Ἰωάνᾱς was sometimes used of a man whose real name was Ἰωάννης. And, indeed, this was very natural; for I have shown that Ἰωάνᾱς is once, at any rate, found in the Sept. = יוֹחָנָן, i.e., = Ἰωάννης and John, and the difference between Ἰωάνᾱς = Jonas or Jonah and Ἰωάνᾱς = John is so very slight, that it would have been hardly sufficient to prevent confusion between the two names. Besides which, similar confusion seems occasionally to have taken place between John and Jonathan in their Greek forms, and even between John and Joseph, which is hardly intelligible (see Smith's Dict. s.v.). At any rate, there can be no doubt but that the revisers have been hardly consistent in turning Ἰωάνᾱ into Jonah. It should have been Jonas; for their practice seems to have been to substitute ah for as in the N.T. wherever ah had been used in the O.T., but to leave the as when the persons spoken of belong to the N.T. only. Thus in Matt. xii. 39, 40, 41, xvi. 4, Luke xi. 29, 30, the Jonas of the A.V. has become Jonah in the R.V., because it is the prophet who is spoken of, and he is known by the name Jonah in the O.T. And, similarly Esaias, in the twenty passages in which it occurs, has been turned into Isaiah, because this is the name by which the prophet is known in the O.T. But Judas has been changed into Judah only where used of the son of Jacob (Matt. i. 2, 3); where used of other persons not found in the O.T. Judas has been left (e.g., Matt. xiii. 55, xxvi. 47, and everywhere in the case of Judas Iscariot). On this principle Jonas should, in the R.V., have taken the place of Jonah in Matt. xvi. 17, and in the note on John i. 42.

The confusion which I deal with in this note has, no doubt, been previously recognised more or less (see the articles in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible on Jona, Jonan, and Jonas). But I find there nothing more than a bare statement of the fact, and I do not know that anybody has pointed out how the confusion came to take place, or has treated of the matter at any length.

LERMONTOFF'S FIRST DUEL.

London: Nov. 10, 1891.

In the complete edition of Lermontoff's works, published on the fiftieth anniversary of his death, there are several letters referring to the first duel with M. Barante, which, without absolutely clearing up its cause, shed new light on the circumstances of the quarrel, and the reason for Lermontoff's second banishment from St. Petersburg.

In the first of these letters, Lermontoff writes to Major-General Pläutin:

"On the 16th February (1840), at Countess Laval's ball, M. Barante demanded an explanation of something that I was supposed to have said. I answered that my words had been inaccurately reported; but, as he was not satisfied with this, I added that I could give no further explanation. To his stringent comment, I replied with equal stringency: whereupon he said that had he been in France he would have known how to end the matter. I answered that we follow the code of honour as strictly in Russia as elsewhere, and that, not less than others, we do not allow ourselves to be insulted with impunity. He challenged me: we agreed, and parted. On Sunday, the 18th of February, at noon, we met across the Black River, on the Pargolova Road. M. Barante's second was a Frenchman, whose name I do not remember, and whom I had not seen before. As M. Barante considered himself the offended party, I gave him the choice of weapons. He chose swords, but we had pistols with us as well. We had hardly crossed swords when the point of my weapon broke, and he scratched me lightly on the breast. We then took pistols. We were to fire together, but I was a little late. M. Barante missed, and I intentionally fired on one side. After that he gave me his hand, and we parted."

At this time Lermontoff was a lieutenant in the Life-Guard Hussars. The commanding officer was informed of the meeting with M. Barante; and, as duelling was strictly forbidden by military law, Lermontoff was immediately placed under arrest in the guard-house of the arsenal.

A second letter continues the story:

"On March 22nd I wrote to Count Branitsky, asking him to tell M. Ernest Barante that I wished to see him at eight o'clock that evening, because reports had reached me that he accused me of falsehood in saying that I had fired on one side, without aiming, and was dissatisfied with me on that account. At eight o'clock that evening I entered the corridor between the officers' and soldiers' guard-rooms, without asking the officer on duty, and without a convoy, as I had always done. After a few minutes M. Barante arrived, and entered the corridor. I asked him whether it was true that he was dissatisfied with my statement. He replied: 'Exactly: I do not understand why you say you fired in the air without aiming.' I answered that I had said this for two reasons—firstly, because it was true; and, secondly, because I saw no reason to conceal a fact that need not offend him, and might be of service to me, but that if he was dissatisfied with my explanation I was ready to meet him again as soon as I was at liberty, on his return, should he desire it. After this M. Barante, replying that he had no wish to fight again, because he was quite satisfied with my explanation, went away."

For this second breach of discipline, involved in arranging an interview with M. Barante without permission and when under arrest, Lermontoff was ordered to leave St. Petersburg, being transferred from the Life-Guard Hussars to the Tenginski Infantry Regiment, then serving in Caucasus against the Cherkess (Circassians).

Apparently the stigma of falsehood was not completely removed from Lermontoff by the military commission; for, on leaving St. Petersburg, he addressed a passionate letter to the Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovitch, begging him to put the truth before the Emperor, and to free him from the undeserved reproach of dishonourable conduct.

It was probably soon after his arrival in Caucasus that Lermontoff finished the "Hero of our Time," and wrote the dedication to "Demon," and perhaps gave the poem its final form.

The Iphigenia at Aulis of Euripides. Edited, with Introduction and Critical and Explanatory Notes, by E. B. England. (Macmillans.)

THE work of English classical scholars may be limited in quantity, as compared with that poured forth from German printing-presses, but it is, at all events, excellent in quality: its saneness and sobriety forming a pleasing contrast to the pompous extravagance of much that proceeds from the Fatherland. It bears upon it, in most cases, the stamp of practical good sense, which characterises the English race in other fields of activity. There is doubtless a good deal of time and trouble wasted in the production of "school classics," with their voluminous notes and vocabularies—those enervating adjuncts of the modern text-book; but besides these little red and blue "Livys" and "Ovids," hardly a week passes without the publication of some sterling edition of an ancient author, displaying a combination of careful learning and critical acumen which would be noteworthy if it were not, to the credit of British scholarship, of such common occurrence.

Such a piece of work, we may say at once, is Mr. England's Iphigenia at Aulis, which will be welcomed by all lovers of Euripides as an attempt (in the editor's own words) "to clear away some of the obstacles which perplex all readers of what is still a most attractive drama." He does not indeed claim any originality for the views he has propounded upon the state of the text and its possible history; but he brings an impartial mind, and a habit of clear and precise expression, to the task which he has set himself—that of ascertaining and weighing the opinions of his predecessors. The general conclusions he has reached, as a result of these investigations, are succinctly stated in the Preface; and all who read the Introduction to the text will agree, we think, that a good case has been made out for them. Broadly speaking, Mr. England regards it as established "that the Iphigenia at Aulis was left by Euripides in too unfinished a state to be put on the stage; that the man or men who prepared it for such representations not only added passages at the end and in the body of the play, but re-arranged the prologue; and lastly, that of small casual interpolations of a later date the text of this tragedy contains an exceptionally large share."

The story of the production of the play, as told by Mr. England, is full of interest. The death of Euripides occurred in or about the summer of 406 B.C. In January of the following year, at the festival of the Lenaea, appeared the "Frogs" of Aristophanes, and early in that comedy occur the following lines (vv. 66—72) spoken by Dionysus and Heracles:

ΔΙ. τιοιουτοί τίνον με δαρδάπτε πόθος Εὐριπίδου.

HP. καὶ ταῦτα τοῦ τεθηγκότος;
ΔΙ. κούδεις γέ μ' ἄν πείσειεν ἀνθρώπων τὸ μὴ οἶ
ἔλθειν ἐπ' ἔκτινον.

HP. πότερον εἰς ᾄδου κάτα;
ΔΙ. καὶ νῆ Δ' εἰ τί γ' ἔστιν ἔτι κατωτέρω.

HP. τί βουλόμενος;

ΔΙ. δέομαι ποιητοῦ θεοῦ·
οἱ μὲν γὰρ οὐκέτ' εἰσίν, οἱ δ' ὄντες κακοί.

The Scholiast on this passage, after remarking that some prefer to assign the first speech of Heracles to his companion, proceeds as follows (we agree with Mr. England that this is a second and independent note): οὗτω γὰρ καὶ αἱ διδασκαλίαι φέρουσι. τελευτήσαντος Εὐριπίδου τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ δεδιδασχέναι ὁμωνύμως ἐν ᾄδει Ἰφιγενέειαν τῆ ἐν Ἀυλίδι, Ἄλκμαίωνα, Βάκχας. The meaning of this, when taken in connexion with the expression of a desire on the part of Dionysus to see his favourite Euripides again, can only be that what he, as a representative Athenian first-nighter, wished for, actually took place, the son of the dead poet producing three of his father's tragedies in deference to the popular demand for them. The plays were brought out ὁμωνύμως, a much disputed term, which Mr. England explains to mean "name and all," or "keeping the author's name," in contradistinction to ἑτερονύμως, "under another name," and ἀνωνύμως, "under no name." The statement of the Scholiast is borne out, in its main facts, by the remarks of Suidas (s.v. Εὐριπίδης) and by the author of the poet's Life. Thus we may, with great probability, conclude that the "Iphigenia at Aulis," "Alcmaeon," and "Bacchae," were prepared for representation by the younger Euripides, and produced at the earliest opportunity after attention had been called to the subject by Aristophanes, namely, at the Great Dionysia, in March 405 B.C.

When we turn to the text we find that Mr. England, as his Preface would lead us to expect, adopts somewhat drastic measures, though he gives good reasons for most, if not all, of the transpositions and omissions for which he contends. Thus, the iambic portion of the πρόλογος (ll. 49-114), happily described by the editor as an "erratic block," of which the last few lines are probably non-Euripidean, appears in its conventional place at the outset of the drama, and the anapaests (ll. 1-48), usually printed before it, are here placed second. Mr. England shows, as we think conclusively, that (apart from the "Rhesus," whose authorship is doubtful) the only other play of Euripides which we have any reason to suppose began with anapaests was the "Andromeda." The hypothesis rests on the note of the Scholiast to v. 1605 of the "Thesmothiazusae" (the passage beginning ὡς νῦν ἐῖρα) to the effect that it is τοῦ προλόγου Ἀνδρομέδας εἰσβολή; but the editor suggests that, instead of conjecturing προλόγου to be a mistake for παρόδου, as Bohnhoff does, εἰσβολή, "beginning," may well be a mistake for ἐκβολή, "conclusion." There is, of course, plenty of direct testimony to Euripides' universal custom of prefacing his dramas by an iambic prologue (notably the passage in the "Frogs," v. 946, where he is made to say

ἀλλ' οὐδὲν πρῶτιστα μὲν μοι τὸ γένος εἶπ' ἐν εὐδὸς τοῦ δράματος and the Scholion at the opening of the "Hecuba," ὁ καὶ ἐν ἀρχῇ πάντων τῶν αὐτοῦ δραμάτων ποιεῖν ἔωθεν); and in the face of it we can hardly believe that the "Andromeda" and the "Iphigeneia at Aulis" were both exceptions to the rule.

The second half of the παρόδος, which by a slip the editor calls the "first Stasimon" (p. xxv.), is by almost all critics admitted to be an interpolation. As such it is printed by Mr. England in the smaller type which he adopts in all suspicious cases of the kind. He treats this "doggerel navy list" with the contempt it doubtless deserves, and leaves it for the first ἐπεισόδιον with "a sigh of relief"; but his opinions as to its spurious character might have been more fully stated, the explanatory (as opposed to the textual) commentary on ll. 254-280 consisting of the following bald notes:

- 268. This introduction of Adrastus is inexplicable.
- 272. πρᾶξιν λαβεῖν τινός] for "to take vengeance on someone" is a most extraordinary phrase.
- 280. δυνάστωρ] is "a vile word," formed on the analogy of ἀνάκτωρ.

This telegraphic style of criticism must, we suppose, be regarded as expressive of impatience, but it is not particularly dignified. It is only fair to say, however, that Mr. England drops his haughty tone when dealing, as he conceives, with Euripides himself. Without pursuing the commentator further, or drawing special attention to the minor omissions which he advocates in the course of the drama, we may proceed to the remarks he makes respecting the ἔξοδος—vv. 1532 to the end. It is full of imperfections both metrical and linguistic, and, as Mr. England asserts, does not come up to the Euripidean standard in point of dramatic completeness, owing to the fact that it does not definitely state either that Iphigenia was sacrificed or was saved. The scene of the slaughter of Polyxena in the "Hecuba" is also closely reproduced, often with an exact verbal resemblance, which the editor exhibits by the aid of that familiar expedient of modern journalism and standing terror of the guilty plagiarist from Mr. Spurgeon and other celebrated authors—the use of parallel passages. With regard to Aelian's famous quotation ἔλαφον δ' Ἀχαιῶν χερσὶν ἐνθῶσω [φίλας] κερύσσαν, ἦν σφάζοντες ἀχθήσουσι σὴν σφάζειν θυγατέρα—

which (as is well known) gave the first impulse to sceptical inquiry into the condition of the text, from having obviously no place in any part of the play as it now stands, the editor boldly suggests that in ascribing it to the "Iphigeneia" of Euripides Aelian may have been trusting to his memory, and that it really occurred elsewhere—perhaps in the "Iphigeneia" of Polyvidus, the Sophist mentioned by Aristotle in the Poetics. He backs up this theory by a striking example of a similar mistake from vol. iv. of the collected edition of Sir Henry Taylor's works, where (p. 46) that distinguished writer quotes a passage from the "Taming of the Shrew," and says in a footnote that it comes from the "Winter's Tale." There is no doubt too great a tendency to regard the ancients as incapable of making slips of this kind, especially when their testimony is essential for the support of some favourite hypothesis. We should not forget that they were human beings like ourselves, and had not the benefit of our literary dictionaries and concordances.

With these imperfect remarks we must take leave of a fascinating subject, and refer those of our readers who wish to pursue it to Mr. England's own pages. It will be gathered from what we have already said, that they will find the various difficulties which darken the course of the drama stated with fairness and precision, and often convincingly met; and they will not regret the time spent upon a play which, as its latest editor says, was in ancient times "among the best-known and best-liked of Greek tragedies, while in modern literature and art it is linked in various ways with such names as Erasmus, Racine, Gluck, and Schiller."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE OGHAM INSCRIPTIONS AT BALLYKNOCK.

London: Nov. 17, 1891.

In October 1889 an underground passage connected with a rath or earthen fort on a farm at Ballyknock, in the county of Cork, was opened by the sons of the farmer's widow. They found in it a pillar-stone scored with Oghams. They also found Oghams on many of the slabs of stone with which the passage was roofed. Hearing in April 1890 of this discovery, the Rev. Edmond Barry, parish priest of Rathcormack, repeatedly visited Ballyknock, and made rubbings and photographs of all the inscribed stones, fifteen in number. The new number of the Journal published by the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland contains Father Barry's readings of these inscriptions. They are accompanied by a careful and learned commentary, and are followed by notes, which contain some corrections made by Prof. Rhys, who visited Ballyknock and examined the Oghams in August 1891. Speaking roughly, the dialect in which most of these inscriptions are written bears the same relation to Gaelic—even the Gaelic of the ninth century—that Latin does to French. Philologists will, therefore, welcome the following fifteen documents, although, like most Ogham inscriptions, they contain little but proper names in the genitive singular. It will be understood that on the stones the words are not divided:

- 1. MAILAGURO MAQ . . . LILA.
(There is a blank space after maq.)
- 2. LAMA DE LICCI MAC MAIC BROCC.
(At the beginning there is a fracture in which a few scores may have been lost.)
- 3. ERACOMI MAQI ERAQETAI.
- 4. GRILAGNI MAQI SCILAGNI.

- 5. CLIUCCOANAS MAQI MAQI TRENI
- 6. DRUTIQULI MAQI MAQI : : RODAGNI.
(For the last word Father Barry gives rrrodagni, the triple r of which can hardly be right.)
- 7. BRANAN MAQI OQOLI.
(For Branan we should have expected Branagni "Corvuli." The Ogham-writer here was obviously using a dialect not spoken by him, but handed down by tradition.)
- 8. BOGAI MAQI BIRACO.
(Prof. Rhys, says Father Barry, doubted whether this inscription is not Mogai maqi Biraci, the first and the last letters being, apparently, obscure.)
- 9. CRONUN MAC BAIT.
- 10. BLAT EGBI.
- 11. ACTO MAQI M . . . MAGO.
- 12. ERCAI DANA.
(Father Barry divides thus: Erca Idana; but cf. No. 10.)
- 13. DOMMO MAQU VIDUCURI.
(For Viducuri Father Barry gives Feducuri; but, in an inscription of this date the sign III should be read v, and there seem to be five, not four, notches before the d. Maqu seems = the indeclinable maccu, mocu of the Book of Armagh, and Adamnán's Life of Columba.)
- 14. ANM MEDDUGINI.
(Here anm, which occurs on twelve or thirteen other Oghams, is an abbreviation of anme* = Ir. ainm, "name.")
- 15. COSALOTI.
(The second letter is doubtful. The sixth is read o (i.e. ó) by Prof. Rhys, u by Father Barry. If the name be for cosalouti, the primeval form of the gen. sg. of cosluath, "swift-footed," the preference must be given to Prof. Rhys's reading.)

From the linguistic point of view, these inscriptions fall into two groups. Nos. 1, 2, 9, 10, and 12, belong to the Old-Irish period, say from A.D. 600 to A.D. 900. The rest are in a primeval Celtic dialect, which, so far as regards its declensional endings, stands on the same level as the Gaulish inscriptions. Thus magi (O.Ir. maic, "filii"), and the names Eracobi, Grilagni, Rodagni, Scilagni, Trent, Drutiquli, Oqoli, Viducuri, Meddugini, and Cosaloti, Eragetai and Bogai, are genitives sg. of the o-declension. In Clu-coanas (No. 5) we probably have the gen. sg. of a stem in n, = Gr. κνός, Skr. śnúas, the oa apparently expressing the fraction of u by the following a (o). The cliu- (rectius cleo-?) may be cognate with Gr. κλέφος and the second element of the Galatian name which Strabo gives as Δομνέκλειος. In Meddugini, which Father Barry rightly connects with the Celtic Medugenos (C.I.L. ii. 162), the del represents the intervocalic spirant dental. So in Ogmic writing ch and th are represented respectively by cc and tt. In Grilagni, Oqoli, and Scilagni, the l (for ll) seems an instance of "singling."

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE president and council of the Royal Society have recommended Prof. Charles Lapworth and Prof. A. W. Rucker for the Royal Medals this year, and the Queen has signified her approval of the award. The other metallists are Prof. Cannizzaro for the Copley Medal and Prof. Victor Meyer for the Davy Medal.

THE great Index of Genera and Species of Flowering Plants, on which Mr. B. Daydon Jackson has been continuously engaged for nearly ten years, is now ready for the printers' hands, and will be issued by the Clarendon Press, under the title "Index Kewensis nominum omnium plantarum phanerogamarum, 1735-1885." The work has been carefully revised by Sir Joseph Hooker, who, besides annotating the manuscript, has undertaken the care of the geographical distribution.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Oct. 24.)

MRS. C. I. SPENCER, vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. S. L. Gwynn read a paper on "The Inartistic Structure of 'Cymbeline.'" The elder Dumas, although he had been an impassioned student of Shakspeare, did not, till he had seen "Romeo and Juliet" acted, recognise him as "the man who after God had created most." Lamb's essay is a weighty testimony on the other side. In the quality of fitness for dramatic presentation, Shakspeare's work is most unequal. It may be taken as a canon that every drama ought to gain by adequate representation, except in the few cases where it is physically impossible, as in "Lear." But "Cymbeline," as the text stands, would not gain by being acted. Its defects are twofold: first, of motive in the jealousy of Posthumus, which appears insufficiently accounted for. Posthumus is not, like Leontes, of a jealous nature; it is unreasonable to suppose that a sane man would fail to see that his objection to Jachimo's first evidence applies equally to the later. But the gravest defect is that of structure. The play is called "Cymbeline;" and the mere fact that it takes its name from so unimportant a character seems to indicate that Shakspeare wished to condone his shortcoming, and pretend that the various actions derived a real unity and coherence from their relation to the central figure of the king. True, they have enough cohesion for a narrative, but not for a drama. We open with the story of Imogen and Posthumus, which is pursued practically without a break up to the end of Act ii. Then comes in the charming idyll of the young princes, distracting attention from the love-story. In reading, one pardons anything for such poetry; but it obscures the course of the action. The third act is the weakest; it is not clear why Pisanio brings Imogen to Milford. Does he expect to meet Posthumus there? If so, why does he leave her? If he believes the rendezvous a mere pretext, why does he take her there? If he wishes to accompany Lucius, why does he not escort her? The answer is, of course, that Imogen may be stranded at the cave, and that Pisanio may be enabled to send Cloten to Wales. That Cloten should travel alone seems as improbable to us as to Belarius. Again, we must allow that probability is strained to connect the boys with the main action. Objections like these are infinitely more prominent to the mind when we see people moving on the stage. Scene 7 in Act iii. shifts back to Rome for a bare twenty lines, to throw light upon the very obscure subject of Lucius's movements; and lastly, when all the personages have been brought together after the long arm of coincidence has been stretched to the utmost, Posthumus is thrown into prison in order apparently to introduce the grossly inartistic masque of spirits. No play of equal excellence merits such strictures. But there is generally observable in the later plays a looseness of treatment. In "Cymbeline" we have nobly dramatic scenes like the parting, and still more the recognition, of Imogen and Posthumus, or, in a different vein, the defiance of Caesar. But, as a whole, one cannot but feel that here is a pretty story which Shakspeare, secure already of fame and money, chose to tell in a loosely dramatic form, and which, considered from the standpoint of strict dramatic excellence, is poor indeed.—Mrs. Spencer read a paper on "Imogen," who is one of Shakspeare's most charming women. In the harmony and symmetry of her character she resembles Portia in "The Merchant of Venice" more than any other. Softer than Cordelia, stronger than Desdemona, more worldly wise than Miranda or Juliet, less sentimentous than Isabella, she is equal to any of these in purity, loving devotion, and nobility of mind. Yet she is not too perfect for human nature. There is in her that tinge of jealousy which Thackeray maintains no good woman is without. One is inclined to find fault with her for the readiness with which she resumes friendly relations with Jachimo, but the freedom of manners of the time must be remembered. Hazlitt's mode of accounting for it is most objectionable. But the real explanation is to be found in the beautiful tenderness and self-abnegation which were the foundation of her character. With all this sweetness of character, she is intellectual, and, best of all, she is religious. All these fine qualities are combined in a form of such loveliness and dignity that the exclamation of Belarius seems most natural—"By Jupiter, an angel, or if not, an earthly paragon."—Miss Louisa Mary Davies, in a paper entitled "A Quartette of Shakspeare's Queens," considered the characters of Elinor of Guienne, Margaret of Anjou, Gertrude of Denmark, and the unnamed widow who married King Cymbeline. In Shakspeare's delineation of these there is a subtle quality of characterisation, which gives them in the respective plays a more commanding position than on other grounds seems their due. It is interesting to inquire by what right they dominate their respective environments. Elinor pervades all the action of the play, has a sharp word for every occasion, is equally at home in the royal presence-chamber and in the besiegers' camp; originating nothing, but ever by her presence giving vitality and intensity to all that passes; and when the unexpected news of her death comes to John, we quite understand his cry of despair. He knows that her energy has been his spur, her sagacity his safeguard, and her indomitable resolution the mainstay of his own shifty character. Margaret is possessed of a mania for ruling. Her picture is so hateful, that we are glad to take refuge from our horror in the supposition that the artist responsible for the portrait grossly exaggerated the excrescences of a character that must at the best have been coarse and unfeminine. It is probable that the increase of hardness and cruelty, which is so noticeable as the history advances, is intended to be represented as the effect of an eternal chafing against the womanish gentleness and small-spiritedness of her husband, and indignation at the desperate predicaments into which this disposition was continually leading them and their friends. It is a little difficult to see why a frail woman like Gertrude, without any special force of character, any strong impulses to good or evil, should be so salient a feature in the tragedy of "Hamlet," as it rests in our memory. May it not be because she holds in her hands the hearts of so many of the principal personages depicted? In the lady who married Cymbeline, we have a far less amiable type of character. She loves to interfere in state affairs. Her influence at Court is unbounded, everywhere felt, by all acknowledged. Her methods of obtaining such an ascendancy seems to savour of a Southern origin. Dissimulation, hatred masked in wretched smiles, malice cloaked in intercessions for mercy, the secret poison offered in the guise of a friendly gift, are not the chosen weapons of the Celt.—Mr. Norman Spencer read "A Comparison of 'Cymbeline,' Massinger's 'The Picture,' and De Musset's 'Barberine.'" No story could have given Shakspeare a better opportunity for the display of his master talents than that of Posthumus and his inconsidered wager. And, indeed, the skilful manner in which the threads of the story are interwoven, and the interest in the main plot never allowed to flag, excite our highest admiration. In Imogen we find all that we most admire and worship in woman, from unstained purity to ornamental cookery. Massinger's play has substantially the same plot as "Cymbeline." The great difference between the two plays lies in characterisation, artistic development, and poetic power. With our belief in the beauty and symmetry of Imogen's character is bound up our belief in the beauty and symmetry of the whole play. It is fortunate that Massinger's claims do not rest upon "The Picture" alone; for its plot is rugged and unsymmetrical, its characterisation poor, and we look in vain for those finer shades of pathos and poetry which give to "Cymbeline" its peculiar charm. About the whole of "The Picture" there is suspicion of stereotype. This is particularly noticeable towards the end. The idea of forcing the imprisoned Ubaldo and Ricardo to ply the distaff for a living is unexpected, and seems to point to over-fidelity to an original. How this might have been avoided is well shown by De Musset, who with true and artistic instinct does not allow a shadow of doubt to exist between the absent husband and wife, and therefore does not use the magic portrait as an essential of the plot, but only introduces it, that it may be indignantly rejected by the loyal husband. De Musset does not spoil his play by the introduction of so forced a character as Honora, and with his single plot he produces the effect of pleasing symmetry which is wanting in Massinger's double plot. The fact that the French play in prose presents a comparison from the poetic standpoint. Shakspeare's merit from that point of view seems to be perfect sympathy with his subject. He uses forms according to the life, and not according to the form. With him the thought is primary, the symbol secondary. Thus he is seldom obscure. And the symbol being the natural clothing of the thought (for his choice is in colours infallible), perfect harmony is the result. In its artistic completeness "Cymbeline" goes forward gathering strength almost to the end; but surely a proud defiance of the Roman would not have been a conclusion less in accordance with art than the actual peace, abandoning the very liberty which had been bought at the cost of much bloodshed.—Mr. L. M. Griffiths read some notes on Sidney Walker's comments on Act I Scene i. of "Cymbeline."

PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Friday, Nov. 6)

HENRY BRADLEY, Esq., president, in the chair.—The first paper, read by the president, was by Mr. Russell Martineau, on the "Pronunciation of the English Vowels in the Seventeenth Century," and consisted of Buxtorf's list of the long and short Hebrew vowels with their English and German equivalents, comments by Mr. Martineau, and John Davies' translation in 1656 of Buxtorf's Latin. Buxtorf died in 1629; his son edited the father's works left unfinished at his death, and issued the Epitome Grammaticae Hebraeae in 1633. As the late Mr. A. J. Ellis did not deal with the pronunciation of the seventeenth century in his monumental work on Early English Pronunciation, but stops at Shakspeare, Buxtorf's list is of interest to students.—The second paper was by Mr. E. R. Wharton, and contended (1) that primarily and essentially $\mu\eta$ is not a negative or prohibitive particle, but an interrogative; (2) that many $\mu\eta$ sentences which are at present printed as assertions might better be printed as questions; and (3) that even in other cases the apparent negative contains or presupposes an interrogative meaning.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Nov. 10.)

DR. E. B. TYLOR, president, in the chair.—Mr. Francis Galton exhibited, on behalf of Lady Brooke, a photograph of a human figure carved on a rounded sandstone rock in Sarawak. The rock is about twelve feet in height, and the sculpture is in high relief, and of the size of life.—Mr. Galton also exhibited some imprints of the hand, by Dr. Forgeot, of the Laboratoire d'Anthropologie criminale, Lyon.—Dr. Tylor read a paper on "The Limits of Savage Religion." In defining the religious systems of the lower races, so as to place them correctly in the history of culture, careful examination is necessary to separate the genuine developments of native theology from the effects of intercourse with civilised foreigners. Especially through missionary influence since the beginning of the sixteenth century, ideas of dualistic and monotheistic deities, and of the moral government of the world, have been implanted on native polytheism in various parts of the globe. For instance, as has lately become clear by the inquiries of anthropologists, the world-famous Great Spirit of the North American Indians arose from the teachings of the Jesuit missionaries in Canada early in the seventeenth century. This and analogous names for a supreme deity unknown previously to native belief have since spread over North America, amalgamating with native doctrines and ceremonial rites into highly interesting but perplexing combinations. The mistaken attribution to barbaric races of theological beliefs really belonging to the cultured world, as well as the development among these races of new religious formations under cultured influence, are due to several causes, which it was the object of this paper to examine: (1) Direct adoption from foreign teachers; (2) the exaggeration of genuine native deities of a lower order into a god or devil; (3) the conversion of native words, denoting a whole class of minor spiritual beings, such as ghosts or demons, into individual names, alleged to be those of a supreme good deity or a rival evil deity. Detailed criticism of the names and descriptions of such beings in accounts of the religions of native tribes of America and Australasia was adduced, giving in many cases direct proof of the beliefs in question being borrowed or developed under foreign influence, and thus strengthening the writer's view that they and ideas related to them formed no original part of the religion of the lower races. The problems involved are, however, of great difficulty, the only hope of their full solution in many cases lying in the researches of anthropologists and philologists minutely acquainted with the culture and languages of the districts: while such researches will require to be carried out without delay, before important evidence, still available, has disappeared.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL SCOTTISH SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THIS society, which of late has been somewhat peripatetic in its ways—holding last year its exhibition in London—has now returned to its old quarters in Sauchiehall-street, Glasgow, and opened, in two rooms of the Institute, a display which comprises a fair proportion of fresh, careful, and spirited work.

Mr. Morrison Powell, the president of the society, is favourably represented in works like his bright and vivid "Shore Waves," and his "Loch Loskin" and "Bull Rocks, Frith of Clyde"; while the vice-president, Mr. W. McTaggart—whether in oils or water-colours, one of the most capable and original of British painters—sends his version, in the latter medium, of "The Young Connoisseurs," a party of fisher children, seen on the sands and against sun-lighted sea, following in delighted wonderment an itinerant Italian image-maker, who carries in his arms his plaster transcripts of the great white shapes of ancient Greece.

Mr. James Paterson is always a prominent exhibitor in West of Scotland art displays; and this year, "The Mill," with its play of colour and light and shade, with its sense of nature's ever-changing, never-ceasing motion, the "White Azalea," so freely and broadly handled, so nobly set against the glowing canvas of Giorgione's "Saint Sebastian and Other Saints," with the rest that he shows, amply sustain the reputation which this clever, Paris-trained Lowlander has already won.

During recent years the main influence that has incited and guided the younger Glasgow artists—indeed, the more capable of the Scottish painters generally—has come from France; but recently the school of early English landscapists has been asserting its educative power, has gradually come to be recognised as exemplary. Mr. R. B. Nisbet has for long worked under Cox; his own excellent works have derived their stimulus, and much of their method, from the painter of "Chunging Pastures." Mr. Nisbet is here represented by his important "Thundery Afternoon," and by such smaller but very complete and harmonious works as "A Cloud," and "Moorland—a Grey Day." Again, Mr. Garden G. Smith's "Yorkshire River," with its quietude, concentration, sober harmony of poetic feeling, and care for restfully balanced composition, is manifestly a sweet echo from the days of Constable and his compeers.

Mr. Tom Scott shows "A Check," his large, freely touched, river-side subject, its foreground made gay with a motley crowd of otter-hunters and their hounds. Mr. A. D. Reid sends several of his tenderly coloured, quietly rendered landscape subjects and Spanish street scenes. Mr. R. W. Allen has been painting in the Far East; and his art has passed into a phase of vivid colouring, which contrasts with the subdued tone-painting of his earlier French manner, and approaches, in works like "Madras Beach," to the incisive handling, to the telling blottesque manner—so effectively suggestive of the sun-lit brilliancy of Nature, of her sparkling, changeful tinting—of Mr. Arthur Melville. The latter shows here his "Javonaise Dancers," already visible in the Royal Scottish Academy, not by any means to be ranked among his highest achievements.

Mr. H. W. Kerr has painted, with an admirable delicacy and thoroughness of modelling in the faces, two studies of aged peasants, the finer being his half-length, cabinet-sized picture of an old Irish woman, bending reverently "At Mass." Mr. John Terriss sends some antique street scenes from Birmingham and Edinburgh, touched in a singularly effective fashion—very luminous and vaporous in their delicate crimson and orange skies; very telling in the opposition to these are the black gables struck so boldly against their clarity. In fact, Mr. Terriss's water-colours evince a facility that is only too great, too insistent, to be entirely welcome in the work of a young painter. They are too "forthright" in manner, too suggestive of Frank Howard's "Whole Art of Picture Making reduced to the Simplest Principles"; they show less than might be desired of that search and effort, of that humble submission to nature, of that reverent eye turned constantly towards her present facts, which best become the true artist in his earlier practice. Yet they are striking works; and if their painter will be true to his own best self, will resist that facility which we should judge to be his besetting sin, he may do really admirable things in the future. His "Twixt the Gloaming and the Mirk"—with its broad horizon line, its great dark windmill-sails spread against the orange sky, its clear palpitating corner of formless cloud appearing to the right, and its largely handled figures of fisher-folk in the foreground, plodding homeward beside the still pools of backwater—is a picture that no visitor to the exhibition can miss the sight of; and none, seeing it, can well fail to be touched by its impressiveness.

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

RECENT DISCOVERIES IN THE EGYPTIAN DELTA.
Cairo: Nov. 7, 1891.

DANNINOS PASHA has been kind enough to allow me to take a copy of a very interesting and important inscription which is now in his possession. The inscription is a long one, and is engraved in hieroglyphs of exquisite form on the three sides of a bronze pedestal of a large bronze statue of the goddess Neith, discovered this summer among the ruins of Sais, along with many bronze figures of the Pharaonic period. Above the hieroglyphs on the front of the pedestal runs a line of Karian characters. According to the hieroglyphic legend, the statue was dedicated to Neith and Horus by Si-Qarr, a name in which Danninos Pasha is doubtless right in seeing the Egyptian words "the son of a Karian," though, in another part of the inscription, the Egyptian name of the dedicatory is stated to be Pe-tu-Neith, "The gift of Neith." Si-Qarr is called the son of Kapat-Qar, "Kapat the Karian," "born of the lady of the house Neith-mert-hà-Uah-ab-Ra." The name of the "prince" Uah-ab-Ra or Apries is not enclosed in a cartouche, showing that he did not claim royal rank.

Si-Qarr is further styled an officer of Psammetichus I., both of whose cartouches are given. It is therefore evident that the prince of Sais, whose name is included in that of the mother of Si-Qarr, must have been a predecessor of Psammetichus I.; and since we know from the Assyrian monuments that the father of the latter was called Necho, while Apries was a family name among his descendants, we must conclude that the Apries of the statue was the hitherto unknown grandfather of the founder of the XXVth Dynasty.

Another interesting historical fact results from the inscription. As the Karian father of Si-Qarr married an Egyptian whose name indicates that she was a native of Sais, we may infer that Karians were settled in that part of the Delta long before the time when their aid was invoked by Psammetichus I. Polyænos (Strat. VII.) is thus shown to be more correct than Herodotus in his reference to the settlement of the Karians and Ionians in Egypt.

But these are not all the conclusions which can be drawn from a study of the newly discovered monument. It proves that Lepsius was right in regarding certain inscriptions found at Abu-Simbel and in other parts of Egypt as of Karian origin. It also shows that the founder of the XXVth Dynasty gave evidence of his appreciation of the services rendered to him by the Karian mercenaries by appointing one at least of them an officer of his court. A bilingual inscription on the pedestal of a small bronze Apis now in the Gizeh Museum, which I have published in my memoir on the Karian texts, had already confirmed the statement of Herodotus, that in the later days of the dynasty the Karians had acted as dragomen; we now know that at an earlier period they could be raised to offices of state. Lastly, we must not forget that the newly found inscription is bilingual, and will, therefore, assist us in the decipherment of the Karian alphabet. On this point I shall have something to say on a future occasion.

I hope that before long it will be possible to commence excavations on behalf of the museum which is about to be founded at Alexandria. Dr. Botti has pointed out the direction in which we must look for the remains of Rakotis, the Egyptian predecessor of Alexandria. Ushelbtis of the time of the XXVth Dynasty have been found in tombs at Gabbari, from which he infers, with justice, that here must have been the site of the necropolis of the Egyptian city, the city itself being situated in its immediate vicinity. Greek pottery of the sixth century B.C. has recently been discovered in the neighbourhood. This is only what might have been expected, when we remember that the Pharos is already alluded to in the Odyssey.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE first winter exhibition of the New English Art Club will be opened next week at the Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. The private view is fixed for to-day (Saturday).

MISS BRODRICK will deliver a course of three lectures upon "Egypt," in Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, on the three first Thursdays of December, at 4 p.m.

MR. ARTHUR L. COLLIE, of New Bond-street, has acquired the copyright of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft's fine statue of John Bright, and is issuing bronze statuettes from the original model, uniform with the statuettes of the same sculptor's "General Gordon."

MR. LOGSDAIL's very clever cabinet pictures of the Riviera afford a pleasant contrast to the fog which at this season of the year too often broods outside the galleries of Bond-street. Once within the pleasant room of the Fine Art Society, where they hang at present, he must have little imagination who is not cheered with the sunshine which the artist has brought away with him from the Mediterranean. The red rocks sinking into bright blue seas, the vivid foliage of the gardens and their not less vivid flowers, the strong lights, the scarcely weaker shadows, were not easy things to paint. Such striking contrasts as much of the scenery affords on a bright day, however delightful they may be in nature, are difficult to translate into paint without some crudity and garishness. To say that Mr. Logsdail always succeeds in harmonising them would be going too far—he sees too strongly and paints too boldly for that; his aim perhaps is rather to startle with what he regards as the truth, than to conciliate by compromise. But some of his most daring effects want but little of success, as "Le Lion de Terre, San Raphael" (15), or the study of flesh in sunlight, "On the Beach in July, Bordighera" (35). More restful are the lovely view "From Beaulieu to Bordighera" (29), and the sweet, gray "Entrance to Vallombrosa" (14). And, indeed, though the power of the painting is alike in all, there is enough variety in these sixty-six pictures to please many tastes. For some quality or another the following seem to us to be among the most notable of them: "A Corner of the Walls of San Remo" (2); "The Beach and Castle, Noli" (10); "Valley of the Nervia" (20); "A Summer Evening near San Raphael" (36); "Up the Vallone" (51); "Finalborgo" (55); "Oil Mills in the Valley Francia" (63); "Mine Host of Albenga" (64); and "The Cogoletto Road" (65).

MUSIC.

OPERA AND CONCERTS.

"LOHENGREN" was again given at Covent Garden on Monday evening, with Chevalier Scovel in the title-rôle. His voice easily filled the theatre; but he was so lavish of it in the two earlier acts that in the love duet and concluding scene there was a lack of resonance, and there were also signs of effort. His view of the part is scarcely supernatural enough; he is, at times, a very mortal hero and lover. Mlle. Martini was not satisfactory in the first and second acts, but good in the love duet. Mlle. de Spagni was the Ortruda, and again showed how thoroughly she has entered into the part; her intentions are always good, though she has not the power of some of her predecessors which this difficult rôle so needs. Signor Abramoff was ill; and, at a few hours' notice, Mr. Ffrangcon Davies took his place, and proved an admirable herald. MM. Dufriche and Lorrain (Frederick and the King) deserve praise. The chorus was far from good; the orchestra played well, although false notes were heard now and then.

Mr. Henschel gave his second concert on Thursday, November 12, when the larger portion of the programme was assigned to M. Ysaye, who played the Mendelssohn Concerto and the Max Bruch Scotch Fantasia. The rendering of the former was very fine, though here and there the individuality of the interpreter was a little too pronounced. This is, of course, a fault in the right direction, for individuality is rare; but to have it and not show it should be the artist's highest aim. It is in his rendering of Bach that M. Ysaye loses himself most in the music; then his virtuosity is really veiled. The Bruch Fantasia is a legitimate show piece, and, moreover, is cleverly written and effectively scored. Mr. Henschel has always been a friend to Haydn, and the performance of the Symphony in C (B. & H. No. 7) was most attractive. One must be very young or very blasé not to be able to enjoy such sound honest music. The programme included Schumann's noble "Genoveva" Overture, and a selection from "Die Meistersinger."

Senor Sarasate gave his second concert on Friday, and again St. James's Hall was crammed. He played the new Max Bruch Concerto for the second time, and the work certainly improves on acquaintance. He was also heard in Saint Saens's third Concerto, and his wonderfully delicate performance of the middle movement produced the usual enthusiasm. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Cusins, was heard to advantage in a Bach Suite.

Mlle. Mathilde Wurm played Chopin's Ballade in F minor at the Saturday Popular Concert. She has good command of the key-board; but this particular piece of the Polish composer, with its "longing sadness," its reveries, and its passionate bursts, demands qualities in the interpreter which Mlle. Wurm does not as yet possess. To name only one or two points:—the loud stretto before the coda lacked tone, and the soft chords lacked mystery; while the plaintive melodies of the coda itself were lost in the notes. Mrs. Helen Trust sang Giordani's florid song "Let not age" charmingly; she was also good in Grieg's characteristic "Solvejg" song, but the first part was somewhat dragged. The Quartet was Beethoven's in E minor, with M. Ysaye as leader; he afterwards played in his best manner some Bach solos. The Quartet was well rendered. The programme concluded with Mendelssohn's D minor pianoforte Trio.

Dr. C. V. Stanford's Dramatic Oratorio "Eden" was performed by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening. The general character of the work has already been described in connexion with the performance at Birmingham. The impression then produced is maintained after a second hearing. The music is clever enough, and as the work becomes familiar, many interesting details attract attention; but cleverness is the prevailing element. The "Hell" section contains some very fine passages, and yet there is something artificial about the scene. Is Satan a myth or a reality? If the former, there is not enough poetry; if the latter, it is not sufficiently impressive. There is neither sufficient interest nor awe. The scene of the Temptation in the last part is certainly one of the most striking in the work, whether considered from a dramatic or a musical point of view. The performance was an exceedingly good one. The choir sang magnificently. Miss Macintyre was in excellent voice; Mdma. Hope Glenn and Mr. Ben Davies were very good. Mr. Henschel has evidently deeply studied the part of Satan, of which he gives a most vivid rendering. Mr. Barnby conducted with his usual ability.

BLANCHE ROOSEVELT.

HAZEL FANE. By Blanche Roosevelt.

3 vols.
The Daily Telegraph says: "Miss Roosevelt has sustained the high reputation won by her as a brilliant writer of fiction....there are admirable characterisations of English types of manhood, every one of which is a distinct and strongly marked individuality. In a word the book is a charming book.....free from the reproach of dulness and frivolity."

MARY A. DICKENS.

CROSS CURRENTS. By Mary A. Dickens. 3 vols.

The Standard says:—"By the grand-daughter of one of our greatest novelists.... Pathetic and almost beautiful.... Miss Dickens writes simply and clearly. She puts her characters and scenes before us with a certain amount of directness that at times reminds us of Mrs. Gaskell."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW VOLUME OF TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN.
Just Ready, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

PITT. By Lord Rosebery.

THE TIMES.—"Brilliant and fascinating. . . . The style is terse, masculine, nervous, articulate, and clear; the grasp of circumstance and character is firm, penetrating, luminous, and unprejudiced; the judgment is broad, generous, humane, and scrupulously careful. . . . It is not only a luminous estimate of Pitt's character and policy, it is also a brilliant gallery of portraits. The portrait of Fox, for example, is a masterpiece."
MORNING POST.—"None of the many biographical sketches published during recent years will better repay perusal than this, and certainly none has been marked on the whole by a more impartial judgment of history, whether national or individual."

NEW ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS BOOK, UNIFORM WITH MR. HUGH THOMSON'S EDITION OF THE "VICAR OF WAKEFIELD."

Just Ready, crown 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 6s.

CRANFORD. By Mrs. Gaskell. With a Preface by Anne Thackeray Ritchie, and Illustrations by Hugh Thomson.

BY J. L. KIPLING, C.I.E.
Just Ready, 8vo, cloth, 2s.

BEAST and MAN in INDIA. A Popular Sketch of Indian Animals in their Relations with the People. By JOHN LOCKWOOD KIPLING, C.I.E. With many Illustrations by the Author.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A volume of animal lore, and a right excellent one it will be pronounced by all those interested in folk and animal lore. . . . Mr. Kipling has managed to compress into 400 pages an unusually large amount of really interesting information. He is scientific without being pedantic, and chatty without ever becoming garrulous. . . . The general public will welcome the book chiefly on account of its more amusing and cheerfully instructive contents; and those who expect much will, for the nonce not be disappointed. The book is full of good stories and of charming illustrations."

A NEW BOOK ON EGYPT.
Just Ready, fcap, 8vo, 3s. 6d.

IN CAIRO. By W. Morton Fullerton.

BY MR. CHURTON COLLINS.
Just ready, crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

THE STUDY of ENGLISH LITERATURE: a Plea for its Recognition and Reorganisation at the Universities. By JOHN CHURTON COLLINS.

THE TIMES.—"Mr. Collins writes forcibly, learnedly, and persuasively, and he certainly succeeds in showing how the too exclusively philological study of modern literatures at present patronised by the Universities tends to encourage a somewhat narrowly pedantic spirit, and to divest literature as such of nearly all that gives it its abiding hold on the human mind."

NEW VOLUME OF MACMILLAN'S ENGLISH CLASSICS.
Just ready, globe 8vo, 2s.

TENNYSON.—AYLMER'S FIELD. With Introduction and Notes by W. T. WEBB, M.A., Professor of English Literature, Presidency College, Calcutta.

Just ready, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. net.

AN INTRODUCTION to the THEORY of VALUE on the LINES of MENZER WEISER and BOHM BAWERK. By WILLIAM SMART, M.A., Lecturer on Political Economy in Queen Margaret College, Glasgow.

NEW PART OF PROFESSOR BALDWIN'S PSYCHOLOGY.
Just ready, 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.

HANDBOOK of PSYCHOLOGY; FEELING, and WILL. By JAMES MARK BALDWIN, M.A., Ph.D., Professor in the University of Toronto, Author of "Handbook of Psychology, Senses, and Intellect."

HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION,

By Dr. RUDOLPH GNEIST, Professor of Law in the University of Berlin.

Translated by PHILIP A. ASHWORTH, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

•• This Edition contains additional Chapters on the Parliaments of the Nineteenth Century down to the Third Reform Bill (1834-5), with an important Note giving the Author's views on the Irish Question, and a New and copious Index.

"As a history of the English Constitution for English readers Dr. Gneist's book has a great advantage over existing treatises. It is not too much to say that Dr. Gneist is indispensable to the student of English constitutional history. . . . And English students have every reason to be grateful to Mr. Ashworth for introducing them to so valuable a work."—Athenaeum.

"This book is a monument of German patience and industry. . . . Dr. Gneist's book ought to be on the shelves of every student of our constitutional history."—Saturday Review.

SPACIAL AND ATOMIC ENERGY.

Part III.—HEAT.

By FREDERICK MAJOR.

Price 7s. 6d.

From a standpoint that matter (ethereal and terrestrial) varies only on account of the manner of its concretion into rigid atoms by enforced cohesion. Atomic and molecular forces attributed to respiration, imparted by ethereal gas energy and Gravitation to effects attending "respirative" rise and fall imposed upon the "earth's surface."

The cause of Atomic and Molecular Action, Terrestrial Heat, Dew-point Cold, the Tides, Expansion and Contraction of Gases, the Electric states, Latent Heat, Combustion, and Explosion explained upon the above principles without according inanimate elastic, attractive, or fluid qualities to any matter.

"This is a learned dissertation of some 600 pages on the important subject, Heat. The author avoids mathematical formulae, his intention apparently being to seek a full explanation of known facts by close reasoning. To effect his purpose he calls to his aid men's extensive knowledge of natural phenomena, taking his subject in a skilful and methodical manner. One of the most interesting chapters is that on "Combustion," and here the author's knowledge and literary power appear at their best. His views on the theory of combustion are readily understood. The atomic and molecular theories are naturally the subject of much discussion, as well as the relation of the different states of matter, and the cause which brings about change of state."—Hesperian Herald.

"The work is one of a thoroughly scientific character, and in his treatment of a hard subject the writer has been happy both in his style and his selection of illustrations and description of experiments. The volume on 'Heat' embraces the whole field of a great and most interesting subject, and students of science—particularly of applied science—will extend to it a thorough welcome."—Scotsman.

NOTES

Describing the Emblems, the Poetical Associations, and other thoughts and subjects employed in the Decoration of the Wares, an Account of the Festivals, and of some of the Customs of Japan.

By JAMES L. BOWES.

Imperial 8vo, cloth, 600 pp., with Plates, £2 12s. 6d.

The "Extra Illustrated Edition," half-morocco, gilt top, 46s. (Only a few copies left.)

Japan Mail.—"It is a noble book. . . a book of the most valuable and genuine character. It is evident that Mr. Bowes has brought together a really representative collection, and that he has made every specimen it contains the object of careful research and intelligent scrutiny."

China Telegraph.—"Few are entitled to speak with absolute authority, but of these Mr. Bowes stands foremost. . . Virtually a complete history of the art; to the true connoisseur it needs little recommendation."

The Academy.—"Produced with singular care and completeness. . . A worthy sequel to the author's previous labours in the cause of Japanese art."

The Times.—"Worthy of its subject and its author."

The Art Journal.—"Remarkably free from mistakes."

The Saturday Review.—"Let us repeat our admiration of Mr. Bowes' beautiful and extensive volume."

The Architect.—"A guide for the collector, and the best of its kind."

The Builder.—"Not only one of the most beautiful, but one of the most useful and rational books upon Japanese art which has been published in England."

Notes and Queries.—"To collectors his books are as authoritative as is to the lover of Etruscan the priceless book of Mr. Williams."

N. Japan's Gazette.—"The volume is one in which the connoisseur will delight."

The Life and Teachings of Mohammed; or, The Spirit of Islam. By SYED AMEER ALI, M.A., C.I.E., Barrister-at-Law, a Judge of the High Court of Judicature in Bengal; Author of "The Personal Law of the Mohammedans," &c.

"It has been reserved for Mr. Justice Ameer Ali, well-known as one of the most prominent and enlightened followers of Islam in India, to defend and recommend his faith in an English work intended chiefly for circulation among Christians—a work equipped with all the resources of Western thought and learning. Mr. Ameer Ali writes with enthusiasm, but with no trace of fanaticism."—The Times.
"A clear-sighted, clearly-stated, and forcible exposition of Mohammedanism as a moral force, and has an advantage over the few good books on the subject that an English reader can obtain."—Scotsman.
"A most remarkable book, deserving the most attentive perusal and demanding the most careful consideration of all who would understand the true significance of Islam. We have read it through with much pleasure and profit, and we do not hesitate to award it unqualified praise."—National Observer.
"An interesting and thoughtful work which deserves and will receive serious attention."—Saturday Review.

BLANCHARD JERROLD'S LIFE OF DORE.

Just published, demy 8vo, with 138 Illustrations from Original Drawings, 21s.

Life of Gustave Dore. By the late BLANCHARD JERROLD, Officier de l'Instructeur Publique de France.

"A most interesting contribution to the artistic and literary history of the past half century."—Graphic.
"A vigorous piece of portraiture written from the standpoint of close personal acquaintance, and yet free from indiscriminate eulogy or exaggerated sentiment."—Standard.
"Quite one of the most attractive books which have appeared this season."—Leeds Mercury.
"An appreciative yet discriminating biography of the artist."—The Times.
"Full of interesting things—what is more, it contains nearly 150 reproductions of drawings by Dore, many of which have not been published before. It is thus in a double sense a valuable memorial of a remarkable man and a true genius."—St. James's Gazette.
"It is our pleasant duty to express warm commendation of the late Mr. Jerrold's book. The excellent in their way—are arranged with great skill, and the narrative flows as from the pen of a practised writer."—Pall Mall Gazette.

By Track and Trail: a Journey through Canada. By EDWARD ROPER, F.R.G.S.

"Unassumingly instructive, written in a cheerful spirit, and uniformly readable. There is a sprinkling of sport, a good deal of interesting information about Indian aborigines and Chinese colonists."—Daily Telegraph.
"The book is written in a light picturesque style, and is one of the most entertaining records of travel recently published."—Glasgow Herald.
"A charming book, brightly written and most profusely illustrated with a large number of exquisite engravings."—Glasgow Herald.
"The book is full of valuable suggestions for the intending emigrant. It may also be recommended to the tourist, who, if he follows Mr. Roper's advice, may plan out a most enjoyable expedition."—St. James's Budget.

CHINA.

2 vols., 8vo, with Illustrations and a New Map of the Empire.

The Middle Kingdom: a Survey of the Geography, Government, Literature, Social Life, Arts, and History of the Chinese Empire and its Inhabitants. By S. WELLS WILLIAMS, LL.D., Professor of the Chinese Language and Literature at Yale College.

Dr. S. WELLS WILLIAMS' "Middle Kingdom" has long occupied the position of a classic. It is not only the fullest and most authoritative account of the Chinese and their country that exists, but it is also the most readable and entertaining. This issue is practically a new work—the text of the old edition has been largely rewritten and the work has been expanded so as to include a vast amount of new material collected by Dr. Williams during the late years of his residence in China—as well as the most recent information respecting all the departments of the Empire. Many new illustrations have been added and the best of the old engravings have been retained. An important feature of this edition is a large map of the Chinese Empire from the best modern authorities, more complete and accurate than any map of the country hitherto published.

"A story of unpretentious excellence. It is no light praise to say that Mrs. Woods has steeped herself in the spirit as well as in the recorded facts of her chosen theme, until her romance of the ill-fated Vanessa is instinct with true illusion and imagination.... Only Scott among the many biographers of Swift affects the mind of a reader with so strong a conviction that he has the actual man and one, if not both, of the actual women, Stella and Vanessa, before him."—Athenaeum.

REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE LIFE and TIMES of NICCOLO MACHIAVELLI. By Prof. PASQUALE VILLARI, Author of "The Life of Savonarola," &c. Translated by LINDA VILLARI. Containing New Preface and Two New Chapters. 2 vols., containing 4 Copper-plate and 29 other Full-page Illustrations. Cloth, gilt tops, 32s.

The Scotsman says: "Now for the first time given to the British reader in a complete and perfect edition. The former edition was short of two important chapters and some interesting documents, all of which are included in the present publication. The author has been able, moreover, to add some valuable touches to his work, and his excellent translator, Madame Linda Villari, has thoroughly revised the translation. As a translation of a massive work into a foreign tongue, her work is surprisingly perfect. Its value as a historical biography is of the rarest sort. English literature owes much to the Professor and his translator for this valuable book."

LITERATURE.

General Craufurd and his Light Division.

By the Rev. Alexander H. Craufurd.
(Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THE Peninsular War still retains its interest for Englishmen. The great wars of the last century, whether in Europe, America, or India, in which English troops were engaged, are never studied in detail and only vaguely remembered; the other great wars of this century, the Crimea, the Indian Mutiny, the campaign in the Soudan, have never taken hold of the public imagination. But if the stream of literature, much of it, like the volume under review, of a popular character, that is being constantly issued may be taken as a guide, it may be fairly asserted that the Peninsular War remains for most people the most attractive episode in the military history of England. This is largely due to the fact that Sir William Napier, the one great military historian whom England has produced, has told the story of the Peninsular campaigns with accuracy, eloquence, and thorough knowledge of the subject. The widespread popularity of Napier's History among all classes is amazing: Routledge's cheap edition is a household book in many cottage homes; English boys of all ages devour it with avidity; and no greater mistake was ever committed by the Civil Service Commission than removing it from the necessary subjects for the examination for admission into Sandhurst. Yet Napier's book has one great defect. He has written the history of the Peninsular War in such a strain that no one will ever dare to write that history again, except in the form of notes on Napier; but he has not written the history of the English army in the Peninsula. It may seem a trifling matter; but it is worth noticing as a proof of this statement, that there has never yet been published, even in the form of a gloss upon Napier, a complete table of the English divisions and brigades in the Peninsula from 1808 to 1814, with the changes in the regiments composing them and the succession of the generals in command.

The most famous of these bodies is the Light Division. Excellent histories of the three English regiments, which, with the Portuguese caçadores, composed it, have been written by former officers—namely, that of the 43rd Regiment by Sir Richard Levinge, of the 52nd Regiment by Captain Moorsom, and of the 95th (now the Rifle Brigade) by Sir William Cope. In addition to these regimental histories, many officers and more than one soldier who served in the Light Division, published reminiscences; so that when the history of the English army engaged in the Peninsular campaigns comes to be written, it will probably be found that there is better material for an accurate history of the Light Division than of any other. Traditions of the former connexion of the three regiments remain to their successors to the present day. The officers of the Oxfordshire Light Infantry (of which the old 43rd and the old 52nd form the linked battalions) and of the Rifle Brigade are honorary members of each other's messes, and the prestige of their Peninsular fame has done much to rank them among the "crack" regiments of the English army. Their glories have been perpetuated by Sir William Napier, himself an officer of the 43rd; and the famous march to the battle-field of Talavera has been celebrated by him in words almost as glowing as those describing the "unconquerable British infantry" of the Fourth Division at Albuera. The fame of the Light Division is inseparably connected with the names of two men: Sir John Moore, who organised and disciplined its future regiments in the camp at Shorncliffe, and Robert Craufurd, who commanded it during the early campaigns of the Peninsular war and fell at its head at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo in January, 1812.

The Rev. Alexander Craufurd, grandson of Major-General Robert Craufurd, has not attempted to write the history of the Light Division. He merely describes its exploits in the Peninsula while it was under the immediate command of his grandfather. He therefore does not narrate at length the striking incidents which illustrated its valour during the pursuit after Masséna in 1811, when the Division was under the command of Sir William Erskine during the absence on leave of General Craufurd; and he does not analyse its services during the campaigns of 1812, 1813, and 1814, when it was under the command of General Alten. He throws no new light on the military history of the period, and his book is of an essentially popular character, being largely made up of anecdotes and miscellaneous quotations from the well-known volumes of Kincaid, Surtees, Costello, and Rifleman Harris, of the 95th, and Captain Cooke, of the 43rd. The only debateable point in military history on which Mr. Craufurd is obliged to touch is the action on the Coa. The question as to the generalship shown by Craufurd in engaging the enemy in front of the river has been often discussed; and to the remarks on this subject every student of tactics or strategy will at once turn. The question is impartially treated, and the view taken by General Craufurd's grandson is sufficiently interesting to all readers of Napier to be quoted in full.

"Sir William Napier was much mistaken," he says, "in saying that Craufurd resolved to fight under these circumstances. I will give Craufurd's own letter, written to the Times, on this subject further on; and concerning his own intentions it must be admitted that he was a better judge than Napier. Sir George Napier represents things much more accurately when he says, 'Craufurd, however, let his vanity get the better of his judgment, and delayed so long that at last the enemy made a sudden attack.' That is the real truth about the business. And this was Lord Wellington's view" (p. 126).

But though this book is not a history of the Light Division (to do Mr. Craufurd justice, he does not pretend that it is), neither is it a biography of Major-General Robert Craufurd. This is far more regrettable. Craufurd was not only a man of singularly marked personality, but one of the finest commanders of light troops known in the history of modern war. His Standing Orders of the Light Division, which have been more than once reprinted, were long used as a text-book; and his operations between the Coa and the Aguada during the four months that Wellington faced Masséna in 1810, are still studied as a masterpiece of strategy. Nevertheless, the Rev. A. H. Craufurd, possibly for lack of materials, has not written a biography of his grandfather. He passes over Robert Craufurd's services in the war with Tippu Sultan in 1790-92, his missions at the Austrian head-quarters in 1794, 1797, and 1799, his deputy-quartermaster-generalship in Ireland in 1798 (the year of the Irish rebellion), and his service on the staff of the Duke of York in Holland in 1799, in a single page. Perhaps Robert Craufurd did not write many letters or leave any diary or memoirs; but a few scraps of information on these years would have been far more valuable than many of the old anecdotes now reprinted. A few pages are given to the operations at Buenos Ayres in 1807, but they contain nothing new. The usual abuse is heaped on the head of General Whitelocke, who is called "a timid and vacillating fool;" but Mr. Craufurd has "failed to find any solid evidence" that he was a traitor. This absurdly strong language is not justified. Whitelocke certainly failed in the attack on Buenos Ayres, but he had shown himself an excellent regimental officer in his younger days. He was not a great general; but failure in a military operation, however irritating to contemporary statesmen and subordinate officers, does not demand such severe censure, more than eighty years after the event, without a careful examination of the whole career of the officer incriminated.

The greater part of the volume is occupied with an account of General Craufurd and the Light Division in the Peninsula, consisting in the main of a pot-pourri of quotations and anecdotes from a large number of well-known books amusingly strung together. This will be naturally disappointing to warm admirers of General Craufurd's character and military talents, who are well acquainted with every one of the books cited, and who would fain know more about the General's own life and thoughts. But Mr. Craufurd does not profess to be writing for students of military history or military biography, but rather for the general public. And it may be added that the general public will probably enjoy his stories and anecdotes and find them new, for Quartermaster Surtees, Rifleman Harris, and Edward Costello are not so well known to the present generation as they were to the last. The most interesting personal detail is given in a foot-note.

"I have heard," says Mr. Craufurd, "through several old soldiers of this war—one having been in a different Division—that Craufurd's voice was singularly clear, and that it could be heard distinctly, even amidst the din of battle" (p. 193).

In conclusion, may I make use of the fact that this notice appears over my signature to thank Mr. Craufurd for the cordial acknowledgment he more than once makes of my articles in the Dictionary of National Biography on General Robert Craufurd, General Sir Charles Craufurd, and Sir Thomas Beckwith? The only statement of mine which he traverses is that "Craufurd cared little for Wellington's censure." Mr. Craufurd says, "On the contrary, he [General Craufurd] cared a great deal for it; and his correspondence affords ample evidence of this." I only wish that this correspondence had been at my disposal, so that I might have avoided the error. I thank Mr. Craufurd for the correction, and express my regret that I falsely imputed a disregard for the censures of his chief to the most brilliant of all the generals who served under the Duke of Wellington during the Peninsular War.

H. MORSE STEPHENS.

Le Misanthrope. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by H. W. Gegg Markheim. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

It is seldom that we meet with a work so excellent in its way as this edition of what many critics regard as the highest and most attractive of Molière's comedies. But for one or two rather curious omissions, indeed, it might be pronounced wholly satisfactory. Mr. Markheim brings valuable qualities to the task he has undertaken—sympathy, penetration, scholarship, and a wide knowledge of the period so finely illustrated in the piece. He gives us over forty closely printed pages of pertinent notes, and the meaning of passages which some readers might be puzzled to apprehend is elucidated with the necessary care. The text is that of the original edition of 1667, but with the spelling modernised. Molière's punctuation is adhered to throughout; for the reason that with him, as with other dramatists, it is personal, characteristic, and suggestive of the tone and accent to be adopted by the actor. Prefixed to the play is Devisé's account of its first representation—the earliest example in France of theatrical journalism; and letters from the most finished representative of Alceste in recent years, M. Delaunay, are quoted from to throw additional light on the character at several points. Altogether, the work is one of no little interest and importance.

On the element of autobiography in the play Mr. Markheim rightly dwells at some length. It can hardly be doubted that in dealing with the essence of the plot, the long unavailing struggle of Alceste against his passion for a woman whom he knows to be unworthy of him, Molière gave voice to what he felt for his faithless, callous, but always bewitching wife. As Mr. Markheim puts it, "Le Misanthrope" is the true love story of a man of genius told by himself in spite of himself. M. Coquelin and others have asked why Molière, of all men the least likely to wear his heart upon his sleeve for daws to peck at, should have told that story to the public. To this Mr. Markheim replies:—

"He was a man and could not help it. Every human being tells his story day by day without knowing it, imperceptibly and by degrees, to somebody; life stops when there is no one to tell it to. There is a phrase—a familiar one—that conveys to every creature a sense of the miseries of prison, exile, and solitude. Molière, amidst all his companions and friends, had no one to speak to. No mother when a boy—he lost his at ten years old; no wife till he was past the prudent age of marriage; no children until he was nearly old enough to be their grandfather. That story which we all of us tell piecemeal, by scraps, and quite unconsciously, to those that live with us and love us, and which Molière did not tell to mother, wife, or children, he told to the beings of his own fancy—to Célimène, Eliante, and Philinte. Little girls repeat many things to their dolls. Molière was a child by the naïveté of his genius, and he too had his dolls—the 'personages in the air,' the 'phantoms' whom he says in the 'Impromptu de Versailles' he 'dresses up for the amusement of the public.' Does he tell them his secrets? No; but he breathes into them some of his soul and of his fire."

Following up the subject, Mr. Markheim enlarges upon the close resemblance between certain passages in the play and the conversation which Molière is said to have had with Chapelle at Auteuil. This resemblance, however, is not so conclusive as has been supposed. La Fameuse Comédienne, from which the story is taken, did not appear until twenty-two years after the "Misanthrope"; and it is suspected that the author, an utterly unscrupulous libeller, deliberately concocted the conversation out of the more impassioned utterances of Alceste. On the other hand, the internal evidence of its truth is by no means weak. Moland holds that the personal sufferings of the poet are here expressed with a ring which, after so long an interval, no new narrative could have possessed. Be that as it may, Mr. Markheim is on surer ground when he comes to the testimony of Lagrange's Registre. According to this, Molière often brought matters of his own household on to the stage, as his friends repeatedly noticed. And that he drew upon bitter personal experience in the "Misanthrope" is obvious to all. Like Alceste, he was the slave of a heartless and incurable coquette, and the anguish she inflicted upon him found clear and vivid reflection in this creature of his imagination. Sir Walter Scott fell into a surprising blunder when he described Molière's lovers as "never ardent or tender." Few plays are marked by a deeper or more exquisite sensibility than the "Misanthrope." In the words of Goethe, whose reverence for its author is a sufficient set-off against the pig-headed depreciation of him by Schlegel, it is one of those comedies that border on tragedy.

Mr. Markheim's mistakes and shortcomings are so few that a single morning's work would suffice to make them good. He incidentally speaks of Tartuffe as the only villain placed by Molière on the stage. Some of us may be inclined to think that Don Juan, the most systematic and remorseless of profligates, is not without claims to figure in the same category. Nor is it quite true that "the public representation of 'Tartuffe' was forbidden until 1669." In the summer of 1667, by verbal permission from Louis XIV., who was then at the siege of Lille, the comedy appeared at the Palais Royal, and would doubtless have attracted a long succession of audiences if the Parliament of Paris, induced by some victims of its satire to believe that the king had been deceived as to its real tendency, had not set their veto upon it until his return. Far more important than such slips as these are the omissions that have to be laid to Mr. Markheim's charge. For one thing, he does not point out that by reason of its beauty of workmanship the "Misanthrope" holds a distinct place among Molière's plays, admirable as they so often are in this respect. "If I tried to make my lines as good as yours," the dramatist said to Boileau, "I should have to spend more hours over them than I can spare." In writing the "Misanthrope," however, he took extreme pains with the diction and versification, devoting at least nine months to his task. Boileau went into a transport of joy over the result. "Le Misanthrope," he said, "will always be deemed your masterpiece." "Vous verrez bien autre chose," replied Molière, to whom manner was of less importance than matter. Probably he was thinking of his beloved "Tartuffe," then in an unfinished state. The power shown in that ruthless exposure of hypocrisy puts it above the "Misanthrope," but as a monument of style the latter justifies the eulogium of the critic. Again, Mr. Markheim has nothing to say of the fate of the piece at the outset, although the point is one on which a warm controversy has been waged. "Le Misanthrope," said some one to Racine on the day after the first representation, "has failed. You can take my word for it, as I was present." In fact, the plot seems to have been thought a trifle too weak; and the audience was put into some ill-humour by the fact that Oronte's sonnet, which they had heedlessly applauded, was shown by Alceste to be made up "de ces colifichets dont le bon sens murmure." But in a few days the tide turned; court and town again united in singing the author's praises, and the play had what in those days was regarded as a satisfactory run. Consequently, an idea which has consoled scores of unsuccessful dramatists in the hour of their affliction, that the "Misanthrope" did not at first win the suffrages of the Parisians, is open to very considerable qualification. Strangely enough, Mr. Markheim, while ready to insist upon the personal aspect of the poem, loses sight of a circumstance to which that aspect lends peculiar significance. Molière and his wife, leading separate lives in the world, met on the stage as Alceste and Célimène—in other words, had to deal in the performance with a position somewhat analogous to their own. Little as the audience may have suspected it, more than one scene between them was a painful reality for the husband, as when he came to the words:—

"Je fais tout mon possible
A rompre de ce cœur l'attachement terrible;
Mais mes plus grands efforts n'ont rien fait jusqu'ici,
Et c'est pour mes péchés que je vous aime ainsi."

How one of the most soft-hearted and sensitive of men could have prepared such an ordeal for himself is a thing which almost passes comprehension. Mr. Markheim would also have done well to say that in all probability the character of Eliante was a reflection of her stage representative, Mlle. Debrie, so long the wife in all but name of the poet. Her affections are centred in Alceste, and Philinte asks him why he does not espouse her.

"Son cœur, qui vous estime, est solide et sincère."

But the unhappy Alceste cannot escape from the wiles of the other enchantress:—

"Il est vrai; ma raison me le dit chaque jour;
Mais la raison n'est pas ce qui règle l'amour."

Here we find a difference between fiction and truth; the voice of "reason" did not appeal to Molière in vain, and Mlle. Debrie resumed her former place in his household. One more oversight on the part of Mr. Markheim may be mentioned. Nowhere does he state that "The Misanthrope" contained the germ of the Racinian school of tragedy. Corneille had for thirty years represented love as a spur to moral heroism, as a means of elevating the personage it possessed. In Alceste it became the "infirmity of a great heart," a source of weakness instead of strength to its victim. Racine, hitherto a disciple of Corneille, lost no time in acting upon this innovation, to which the full development of his gifts was very largely due.

In the "Misanthrope," as most of us know, Molière brought his wide perception of universal truth to bear upon what did not purport to be more than a satirical picture of the good society of his own time. "Il n'a point voulu," says Devisé in the Lettre hereinbefore mentioned, "faire une comédie pleine d'incidents, mais une pièce seulement où il pût parler contre les mœurs du siècle." Mr. Markheim treats this as an echo of some conversation between the poet and the journalist on the subject. Probably it was; but to assert that it "must" have been so is going a little too far, especially as the author of Nouvelles Nouvelles was quite capable of assuming a knowledge where he had it not. After all, the matter is merely one of plausible conjecture. It may relieve some of our readers' minds when we state that Mr. Markheim has no pet theories to ventilate, no idle speculations to indulge in, with respect to presumed "originals" of the principal characters. He is content to recognise certain traits of the Duc de Montausier in Alceste, of the Comte de Lauzun in Acaste, and of the Comte de Guiche—the supposed seducer of Molière's wife—in Clitandre. He does not seek to identify Philinte with Saint-Gilles, Oronte with Saint-Aignan, or the tantalising Célimène with the Duchesse de Longueville. That the Duc de Montausier was regarded at court as the model of Alceste in his misanthropy there can be no doubt. If we may repose implicit faith in Saint-Simon, who wrote from hearsay nearly half a century later, this surly but high-minded noble, indignant at the liberty taken with his special idiosyncrasy, talked of chastising the audacious author, but on seeing the play was overjoyed to find that he could be thought to resemble "so perfect a man." I suspect that this story of the threat was a mere invention for the sake of contrast; the Duc de la Feuillade had been sternly rebuked by the king for offering an insult to Molière, and it is scarcely likely that even the Duc de Montausier would have run the risk of similar humiliation. In regard to the much-discussed noun in Alceste's judgment upon Oronte's verse—

"Franchement, il est bon à mettre au cabinet"—

Mr. Markheim suggests that if it had had an equivocal meaning in Molière's time he would not have put it in the mouth of a personage like Alceste, so distant and dignified in his bearing towards the poetaster—an argument that should be convincing to all save those who are troubled with what one of the ladies in the "Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes" calls a sharp nose for secluded dirt. Besides, contemporary literature shows clearly that the phrase was used in the sense of "shelve" or "put in the fire."

Macaulay and Scott, it may be remembered, think Alceste "rude." Mr. Markheim defends him against the charge, holding that the grace with which the character is tempered has been more or less underrated. M. Delaunay writes to him on this subject:

"La parfaite raison fuit toute extrémité Et veut que l'on soit sage avec sobriété."

"Voilà la pensée de Molière exprimée par l'honnête homme Philinte. Alceste a le grand tort de n'être pas sage avec sobriété. La contradiction l'irrite, et lui fait dire des paroles qu'il ne pourra réaliser que poussé à bout. . . . Alceste est de bonne foi, mais Molière va lui prouver dans la scène suivante qu'il n'est pas si facile qu'il le croit de dire la vérité aux gens. Oronte veut lui lire son sonnet. Alceste s'en défend, mais il cède. . . . Philinte, en homme du monde, se débarrasse d'Oronte avec quelques louanges. Mais que va dire Alceste? Immédiatement d'après sa maxime, il va répondre: 'Monsieur, votre sonnet est pitoyable, voilà mon sentiment.' Molière est bien trop gênial, et connaît trop bien le cœur humain, pour cela. Et voilà mon pauvre Alceste, tournant, virant, prenant des biais—et cela devant Philinte, qui sourit sous cape. 'Monsieur, cette matière est toujours délicate' (dix vers). 'Je ne dis pas cela' (quatre vers). 'Je ne dis pas cela' (trois vers). Puis, au troisième, 'Je ne dis pas cela, voilà mon Alceste lancé, le sang lui monte à la tête, et la vérité se fait jour. . . . Mais voilà dix-sept vers de préparation. . . . Alceste, malgré lui, n'est pas aussi brutal qu'il veut bien le dire."

It will be thought that the last sentence is scarcely in favour of Mr. Markheim's view. But the rudeness of Alceste has certainly been exaggerated; the "dix-sept vers de préparation" go with other circumstances to show that his morbid hatred of social hypocrisies is not unaccompanied by the delicacy of feeling to be expected from his birth and training. Mr. Markheim's sympathetic and luminous little volume will probably do much to dispel the misapprehension of which he complains.

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

With Axe and Rope in the New Zealand Alps.
By G. E. Mannering. (Longmans.)

THIS short book, of less than 150 pages, is admirable in its way. It records the climbing adventures of a New Zealand gentleman, self-taught in the mountain craft. The author and his friends have now founded an Alpine Club of their own. Some day they will look back upon this book as bearing to their club a relation similar to that borne by Peaks, Passes, and Glaciers to the parent association in this country.

Mr. Mannering describes his experiences with praiseworthy brevity and clearness. Only now and again in a well-chosen epithet or a brief sentence do we discover the deep feeling for mountain beauty, the heart-fellowship with mountains, that animates both him and his friends. He attempts no fine writing, but goes straight to the point of his simple narratives, which thus possess an interest often unattained by more ambitious efforts.

The Alps of New Zealand are not specially lofty among the mountains of the world. Aorangi, the highest of them, commonly but less euphoniously called Mt. Cook, is only 12,349 ft. high. Nevertheless, these ranges, owing to their relatively high latitude and the considerable amount of the local snowfall, are the parents of glaciers larger than any to be found in the Alps of Europe. The mountain scenery of New Zealand is admitted by all who have studied it to possess a grandeur and beauty of its own, and of a very high order. The aim of Mr. Mannering and his friends is to carry on the work initiated by the Rev. W. S. Green, and to attract the holiday seekers of Australia and New Zealand to a playground that Nature has kindly formed on purpose for them.

The exploration of the district has been simplified by the erection of a hotel near the foot of two of the principal glaciers. Moreover, the Government of the colony has not been idle, but has caused an admirable map of the central portion of the mountain range to be constructed; and a copy of this map accompanies Mr. Mannering's book. The volume is also illustrated by several useful reproductions of photographs, made by an enterprising local firm of photographers. Unfortunately, the process work has been very badly carried out.

The ambition of every climber in New Zealand must, of course, be to climb Aorangi. Mr. Mannering's party was the third to place foot on the highest ridge, but four years of failure preceded their success. It seems clear that the right route to the peak has not yet been discovered. The way followed up to the present time is very dangerous in many places. Owing to the difficulty of getting porters, and to the great distances which have to be traversed on the glaciers, the sum-total of what has been accomplished in the New Zealand Alps is relatively small. When the climbers of that country have learned to reduce the weight of their equipment, and to use climbing-irons (which they have not yet attempted), they will be able to accomplish a much more complete exploration of their beautiful mountains than any that has yet been undertaken.

W. M. CONWAY.

History of the Jews. By Prof. H. Graetz. Edited and in part translated by Bella Löwy. Vols. I. and II. (David Nutt.)*

THE English translation of Prof. Graetz's well-known work is to be completed in five volumes, carrying down the history of the Jews to 1870, while the German original, which only goes as far as the events of 1848, fills eleven volumes. This condensation has been obtained by omitting the foot-notes, on the plea that they are only interesting to historical students, who are usually acquainted with German, and therefore can read them in the original. The sacrifice was, perhaps, not very judicious. To begin with, it seems rather sanguine to expect that any but historical students will read through five thick volumes all about a people whose annals for the last eighteen centuries have not been particularly interesting to anyone but themselves. However this may be, the average English historical student reads his own language at least twice as fast as he reads German, and, therefore, merely to save time, uses a translation whenever he can trust it. And, although this particular translation is a marvel of cheapness, its purchasers can hardly be expected to lay out three guineas more on the German edition.

The need of some additional authority often makes itself felt in reading the version of Jewish history now presented to us; and one almost suspects that Prof. Graetz has access to sources of information denied to ordinary students. Thus, we are told (vol. i., p. 200) that

"Omri introduced the service of Baal and Astarte as the acknowledged mode of worship. He built a temple for Baal in his capital of Samaria, ordained priests, and commanded that sacrifices should be universally made to the Phœnician idols. He desired that the worship of the bull, as observed in Bethel and Dan, should be abolished."

Our only source (1 Kings xvi. 25) merely says that Omri did worse than his predecessors, without specifying in what his greater wickedness consisted. For the rest, we learn, in direct contradiction to Prof. Graetz, that he continued the religious practices of Jeroboam. A little further on (p. 209) it is stated that "the hundred prophets who had been hidden and kept in the caves of Carmel by Obadiah were present at the sacrifice offered by Elijah." What then becomes of the sublime apostrophe, "I, even I only, am left a prophet of Iahve; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty?" In our historian's narrative it is Jehoram (who was ill in bed), and not the watchman that recognises Jehu at a distance by his furious driving. That Jehu ordered the officers who put to death all the princes of the house of Ahab to be "executed as murderers" (p. 218) may be true, but is certainly not stated in the Scriptural narrative. Those who wish to know more about the declining period of the Northern Kingdom than is related in the scanty extant records will find their curiosity partially gratified in the following passage:

"Almost a century had passed since the prophet Elijah, with flowing hair, had declaimed against the sins of Ahab and Jezebel; but the prophetic societies which he had founded still existed, and acted according to his spirit and with energy similar to his own. The young, who are generally more ready to receive ideal impressions, felt a disgust at the increasing moral ruin which came on them, and assembled round the prophetic centres in Bethel, Gilgal, and Jericho. The generation which Elisha had reared and taught discarded these external symbols [what symbols?], but pursued the same Nazarite frugal mode of life, and wore long flowing hair; but they did not stop at such outward signs, but raised their voices against the religious errors, against luxury and immorality. Sons became the moral judges of their fathers' customs. Youths gave up drinking wine, whilst the men revelled in the drinking places. The youthful troop of prophets took the place of the warning voice of conscience. In the presence of king and nobles, they preached in the public assemblies against the worship of Baal, against immorality and the heartlessness of the great. Did their numbers shield them from persecution, or were there among the ranks of the prophets the sons of great people, against whom it was impossible to proceed with severity? Or was King Jeroboam more patient than the accursed Jezebel, who had slaughtered the prophet's disciples by hundreds, or did their words fall heedlessly [sic] on his ears? In any case it is noteworthy that the zealous youths remained unharmed. The revellers only compelled them to drink wine and forbade them to preach; they derided the moral reformers who exposed their wrong-doings, but they did not persecute them" (pp. 241, 2).

Or, we may ask in our turn, has Prof. Graetz access to those "chronicles of the kings of Israel," so often and so tantalisingly referred to by the Hebrew historian? Or has he evolved the whole of these Salvationist proceedings from his own moral consciousness at the suggestion of these two verses in Amos:

"And I raised up of your sons for prophets, and of your young men for Nazarites. . . . But ye gave the Nazarites wine to drink; and commanded the prophets, saying, Prophecy not" (ii., 11, 12).

This is, indeed, "enlarging the telegram." But it is worse that Prof. Graetz should take similar liberties with the Christian Scriptures, with the inevitable, though probably not calculated consequence of heightening the prejudices of his Jewish readers against the Christian Apostles. "Peter was called by his Master 'him [sic] of little faith'" (ii., p. 170). The term is only once applied to Peter in the Gospel history, and then it occurs in a narrative that Prof. Graetz would probably reject as fictitious. The following passage is quoted from Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and interpreted as a reference to his conversion:—"If it were in the flesh I know not, if it were supernatural I know not, God knows; but I was carried up beyond the third heaven;" on which Prof. Graetz observes, "This is not very lucid evidence as to a fact which was actually supposed to have happened" (ii., p. 226). Has it been adduced as evidence of the alleged fact? Does not the date given by the Apostle (fourteen years ago) preclude such an assumption? The Professor has evidently not made a very deep study of the New Testament, but he is an authority on Ecclesiasticus. Great, then, is our surprise to find him dating the Greek translation of that book after the destruction of Jerusalem (ii., p. 362), although the translator himself informs us that he lived in the time of Ptolemy Euergetes. A general reader of the most moderate curiosity must long for a few lines of annotation in the face of such a paradox as this.

In the foregoing observations it has been assumed that the translation is correct. On the title-page the work is described as having been "revised" by the author; but whether such revision was limited to the original, or was extended to the English version, is not clear. At any rate, some palpable blunders have been allowed to stand. In reference to the war between David and Ishbosheth we read that "many Israelites no doubt privately wished that the . . . war might cease with the subjection [sic] of the king of Judah" (i., p. 113). For "subjection" we should evidently read "victory." "In the ruins of a temple at Thebes . . . the figures may be seen of decayed bodies, which may be recognised as prisoners" (i., p. 189). One might suppose from this that Shishak had dragged a number of corpses in triumph. But the German phrase must mean defaced representations, not bodies in a state of decomposition. That very scandalous old lady, Asa's mother, is described as having erected a "disgusting picture for worship in the valley of Kedron" (i., p. 195), whereas it was an image or statue. Jehoash "contents himself [!] with destroying the walls of Jerusalem, together with the town, the palace, and the temple" (i., p. 231). What the Israelite king really did, and what no doubt Prof. Graetz has stated, was to break down part of the city wall, and to plunder the temple and the royal palace of Jerusalem. "Josiah had expected . . . by means of the intervention of Egypt to put a stop to the incursions of other powers" (i., p. 207). Here, again, there seems to be a strange misunderstanding, as Josiah's object was not to invite the interference of Necho, but to keep him out of Palestine. The gate of Nicanor is described as "cast in Corinthian iron" (ii., p. 111), a metal unknown to archaeology. The material used was, of course, Corinthian brass. "The first procurator whom Augustus sent to Judæa was the captain of the horse, Coponius" (ii., p. 129). Coponius belonged to the equestrian order, at that time a purely civic dignity, and was no more a "captain of the horse" than Sir Gorgius Midas is a knight errant. Prof. Graetz himself may be guilty of making Caligula "gather shells in Britain" (ii., p. 184); but it must be the translator who has exalted that emperor's assassin to the rank of prætor (ii., p. 191).

Chaerea was, in fact, a tribune of the prætorian guard, and is probably called "Prætorianer" in the original. It might have seemed impossible that any person educated enough to take part in translating a historical work could suppose there was such a thing as a king of Asia Minor in the reign of Claudius. Nevertheless it is as such that Cotys king of Lesser Armenia figures in these pages (ii., p. 197). Herod was, it seems, the "ancestor" of Josephus (ii., p. 281), a circumstance which the well-known modesty of that writer has induced him to conceal. Or does the translator use "ancestor" in the rather wide sense attributed to that word by our own Royal Family?

It seems, then, that the volumes now presented to the English public are freely sprinkled with statements either quite inaccurate or of a highly questionable character, the responsibility for which must be divided in an uncertain degree between the author and the translator. Nor is this all. Through the whole pre-Exilic period of Hebrew history Prof. Graetz is still at the standpoint of Ewald, or at some more antiquated stage of inquiry. For him the great series of modern critics, from Reuss to Stade, have written in vain. In dealing with the early history of Christianity, he is at the standpoint of Baur and of Baur's immediate disciples. Thus, the antithesis between Judaic Christianity and Gentile, or as the translator rather uncouthly calls it, heathen Christianity, is strained to a degree that more recent researches have shown to be enormously exaggerated. Neither does the author seem to have profited by the light which the cuneiform inscriptions have thrown on the history of his people. He distinguishes Pul from Tiglath-Pileser, against the opinion of the majority of Assyriologists (i., p. 266); and he speaks of the Persians under Cyrus as having "probably destroyed" the idols of the Babylonians (p. 361); whereas Cyrus is proved to have offered up thanks to the gods of Babylon for helping him to the conquest of that city.

Everything that Prof. Graetz has to say about the rise of Christianity and its relation to contemporary Judaism will be read with deep interest, if for no other reason than that it well illustrates what is so little considered in this country, the standpoint of the learned Jew—that is to say, of the scholar who criticises the prevailing religion without ever having been consciously affected by its characteristic influences. It cannot be said that Prof. Graetz is impartial, but he tries to be just. Towards Jesus his tone is sympathetic and admiring. The great merit of the Galilaean teacher, according to him, consisted in carrying religious teaching down to the lowest and most neglected classes of Jewish society. The responsibility for his death is so far as possible shifted on to the Romans; but if Jesus really declared Himself to be the Son of God—a point on which Prof. Graetz has his doubts—then, we are told, the Synhedron had no choice but to pronounce his formal condemnation, and to hand him over to the civil authorities for execution. That the death-sentence was wrung from Pilate by the clamour of the Jerusalem mob is denied point-blank, but, according to the custom of this historian, without reason given (ii., p. 164).

Very different measure is meted out to Paul, and the animus with which Prof. Graetz writes about him has already been incidentally illustrated. We may admit that the great Apostle was "excitable and vehement," but hardly that he "could not endure any opposition to his opinions, and was one-sided and dictatorial in his treatment of those who differed from him in the slightest degree" (ii., p. 225). Paul was the most conciliatory of men on every point but one—the necessity of emancipation from the Mosaic Law; and none should know better than Prof. Graetz that on this one point the whole future of Christianity depended.

Our author writes as an ardent Jewish patriot, with a bitter prejudice against the enemies of his people, among whom must be reckoned the Israelite kings of the Ten Tribes. The result is a certain strain on historical truth. To take one instance out of several, he tells us that Judas Macabaeus was "in the hour of battle like a lion in his rage, and at other times like a dove in gentleness and simplicity. . . . He only resorted to bloodshed when compelled by necessity to recover lost freedom or to raise a humbled people" (i., p. 477).

This necessity seems to have presented itself rather often, and to have been understood with a large latitude of interpretation. The impression left by our only authentic source is that Judas was a ferocious guerilla chief, who when he could not storm a fort set fire to it and left all the inmates to perish in the flames; and who when he stormed a town invariably put the whole male population to the sword, a process euphemistically described by Prof. Graetz as "disarming its defenders" (p. 492). Of his dovelike gentleness the old annalist says not a word that I can find. But with all his reticences Prof. Graetz's second volume supplies the materials for a sufficiently faithful estimate of Judaism in its later developments, and the result is not very attractive. In its external relations the Hasmonaean state was aggressively intolerant—witness the forcible conversion of Edom; while at home it was cruelly fanatical—witness the crucifixion of eighty poor women for witchcraft at Ascalon under the gentle Salome Alexandra (ii., p. 54). So low was the standard of humanity, that Rabbi Judah is praised for saying, "Consider accused persons as law-breakers whilst on trial, the moment that is over look upon them as innocent" (ib.). The son of Judah's successor, Simon, condemned to death on the evidence of false witnesses, succeeded at the last moment in vindicating his innocence, but nevertheless persuaded his father to carry out the sentence, in order that the testimony of other, quite possibly false, witnesses might not be discredited on future occasions. For this act of insane pedantry father and son are equally glorified by the historian (ib.). One asks in amazement, has the Semitic mind then really no conception of truth? The noblest Jews seem unconscious of any obligation to keep faith to an enemy of their race. During the great revolt that terminated with the destruction of Jerusalem, a Roman garrison surrenders to Eleazar under a promise that their lives will be spared. No sooner have they laid down their arms than they are attacked and massacred all but their commander, who accepts what by unconscious irony is called the Judaean faith (ii., p. 262). On the very next page we find Eleazar and his cut-throats lauded for their noble and disinterested moderation in not persecuting their fellow-countrymen. During the revolt under Trajan the Egyptian Jews "probably" celebrated their temporary success by making their Roman and Greek prisoners fight with wild beasts or in the arena. "This," observes Prof. Graetz, "was a sad reprisal for the horrible drama to which Vespasian and Titus had condemned the captive Jews" (ii., p. 399). It seems an unimportant consideration that the reprisals were exercised on innocent persons.

Apart from sexual morality, the countrymen of Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius had little to learn from such a race either before or after its political destruction. "The law disapproved of manumission" (ii., p. 339). What a contrast to Roman jurisprudence in its attitude towards slavery! According to Rabbi Eleazar ben Hyrcanus, whose theories on female education, we are told, finally prevailed, "to initiate one's daughters in the Torah is as good as to initiate them in prostitution" (ii., p. 478). What a contrast to the lessons of Plato and the example of Plotinus!

No friend of humanity would wish at the present moment to say a single word in extenuation of the wrongs done through so many centuries to that gifted and unhappy race of which Prof. Graetz is so distinguished an ornament, and whose heroism in the past he so impressively sets before us. What I protest against is the undue exaltation of that race, with the accompanying disparagement of the Hellenist civilisation by which humanity was first truly taught, and through which alone it is at last beginning to be truly practised.

ALFRED W. BENN.

The March of Man and other Poems. By Alfred Hayes. (Macmillans.)

MR. HAYES writes blank verse with a good deal of skill. If there is any knack in the production of this measure, he certainly has the knack. His pauses are well varied, and the metrical construction of his lines is generally good. He can roll off with ease an elaborate eloquently involved passage, and he can throw off as readily a smart epigrammatic one. Of both kinds it would be easy to select many examples from his book. Skill of this sort has its worth, but it does not necessarily make a man a poet: and it is much to be doubted whether The March of Man can be called a poem in any but a conventional sense. The very qualities in it which are a mark of cleverness almost imply the absence of that gift of poetic insight for which mere facility ought never to be mistaken. I fancy that a poet competent to handle such a subject would have told us more in twelve pages than Mr. Hayes tells us in nearly twelve times twelve. Indeed, Mr. Hayes himself gives us the whole matter of his poem in a small fraction of its actual bulk. The rest mainly repeats in one form or another this essential portion.

A "march" is a forward movement, a steady progress; but Mr. Hayes's theme makes no progress at all: it leaves off where it begins, and begins where it leaves off. The same ideas occur perpetually throughout the poem. Man is always either suffering or triumphing. Either lust and greed and tyranny have the upper hand, and the poor and helpless are sacrificed to them; or the poor rise in the might of their numbers and avenge themselves. The dawn of larger freedom and nobler life is coming into sight from the first pages of the poem to the last; while the dark clouds which the dawn is to dispel are present from beginning to end. So palpable is the want of method, that one cannot understand why the poem was written in two cantos instead of any other number, or why the mere name of cantos was used at all. The division is a purely arbitrary one, and there is nothing in either canto which is not, in substance, to be found in the other also. Here is one of several passages, all having the same purport, in Canto I., which could be matched by as many from Canto II.:

"Tempt them not,
Ye, whom their nakedness hath softly clothed,
Ye, whom their slow starvation hath fed sleek;
Sleep on, and let the hungry millions tramp
Unchallenged past your tents; or, if ye wake,
Out of their path, as o'er the Gallic bounds
Your fathers fled; and see ye stand not by
With listless smile or academic sneer
To mock their rude requital; they have told
Your lavish lusts and strictly reckoned up
Your debt of folly; let them not require
Of you the silver hairs their sires ne'er saw,
Of you the bread their little ones have lacked,
Of you the blood their simple sons have shed,
Of you the honour from their daughters torn;
Yield them thus late their own, the fields they till,
The wealth their toil hath fashioned."

If this extravagant claim were satisfied, a much worse inequality than exists already would have to be redressed. It is not, however, to point to its bad political economy that I have quoted the passage. Compare with it the following extract from Canto II., occurring more than sixty pages further on in the poem:

"The people's lips
Have touched the rim of wisdom's cup, and soon
Shall drink it deeply, till the sacred wine Bound in their veins and fill them with the strength
Of giants; and the watchword 'All for All,'
Uttered by millions marshalled in one cause,
Shall win redress for labour's heaped-up wrongs,
None daring to gainsay. But if the rich, Drowsy with comfort, stop their ears, that watchword
Shall heighten to a battle-cry, and wake
A conflict which shall grant no truce till toil
From the fat purse of idle luxury
Hath wrung the utmost farthing."

Except that in the first of these extracts the rich are bidden to "sleep on," as being apparently the best thing they can do, while in the second it is their growing "drowsy with comfort" which brings upon them a terrible fate, the burden of the two is essentially the same. One more example of this repetition should suffice:

"The man of toil,
Slow as a dray-horse, gentle, patient, strong,
Will cease at last to bear the monstrous load
Of others' pride, and wage for others' waste
The sordid strife we suffer . . .
. . . will no more endure to see
His sons grow wan with hunger, toil, and care,
His daughters seize the harlot's poisoned cup . . ."

It is hardly conceivable that Mr. Hayes would have gone on repeating himself in this fashion if he had had any distinct plan in his mind when he began the writing of his poem. Nor is it conceivable that if he had possessed less facility in the mere construction of verse [he would have given us so many glib nothings as the poem contains.

The other poems in the volume are far less ambitious, and are for that reason of far higher quality. That Mr. Hayes can strike a true note when he obeys a genuine inspiration let the following little poem—addressed "To One in Sorrow"—bear witness:

"Patience! Time's gently-pressing palm
Is on thy wound. Thou canst not feel
The virtue of the looks that calm,
The quiet of the hands that heal;
Yet some glad morning thou shalt rise
To taste again Joy's sweet surprise."

"So from the day that saw it fade
The plant takes heart. Thou canst not mark
The nucleus bud, the wrinkled blade,
Forcing their prison cold and dark;
Yet in some fostering sunny hour
Doth spring to life a new-born flower."

Sir Ralph's Secret. By J. Maclaren Cobban. (F. Warne.)

MISS BLANCHE ROOSEVELT'S Hazel Fane is a protest against the administration of English law in capital cases. She is especially angry with those judges who take the position of counsel or jury, and reminds them that their business is to administer the law pure and simple. She remarks that "familiarity is the dry rot of the nineteenth century," and it seems even to have affected the judicial bench. "People go to criminal trials as they go to kettledrums." Passing to her serious gravamen, she observes:—

"For the non-delivery of a bale of goods a man has an appeal to the House of Lords; for the vexed question whether a threepenny-halfpenny railway ticket was stamped on the 24th or 25th day of the month there is an appeal to the House of Lords; but for the mighty question of life or death there is no appeal."

But with regard to this, let us take the painful case of Jacob Brent, which forms the groundwork of Miss Roosevelt's novel. Brent was convicted of the murder of his brother on the very clearest circumstantial evidence ever produced in a court of justice; yet he was innocent notwithstanding, as was subsequently made manifest. But how would an appeal have benefited him? No; in the least. If there had been a hundred appeals to the House of Lords, their lordships could not, on the evidence, have reversed the verdict of the jury. There was no question of law involved; and trial by jury, with all its defects, is better than trial by judges; for while the latter might quibble a man's life away, the unbiased verdict of twelve disinterested men on the common sense and the facts of a case would be much more likely to do substantial justice to the accused. No, the real point of Miss Roosevelt's story lies elsewhere—if it means anything, it is a powerful argument against capital punishment. Brent's case lends point to John Bright's contention that one of the great arguments for the abolition of capital punishment is the inevitable conviction sometimes of the wrong man. Apart from her main intention, Miss Roosevelt makes several errors in her story of to-day. We can quite believe that some of her characters had a wonderful picnic dinner at the famous inn at Ipswich where Dickens wrote Pickwick, and that Mrs. Bernard Beere thrilled them afterwards with her marvellous assumption of Sardou's Fédora; but we cannot quite so readily believe that they hunted the stag in Suffolk. When she speaks of "two of Suffolk's four M.P.'s" we may remind her that Suffolk has five M.P.'s. A certain firm appears now as "Howel & Hawkes" and now as "Hummel & Hawkes." But the novel as a whole is very entertaining, and Hazel Fane is a delightful creation.

A Red Sister, by Mrs. Pirkis, is a story of three days and three months. Although the literary skill displayed in it is not great, it is well constructed, and the incidents are exciting. Lady Joan Herrick, only daughter of the impecunious Earl of Southmoor, rejects the love of Father Vaughan Elliot, a poor clergyman, and marries Mr. John Gaskell, son of a millionaire coal-owner, of Longridge Castle. She hopes that his father will soon die, but he manifests an unconscionable tenacity of life. When the novel opens he is upwards of ninety years of age, so Lady Joan has practically sold herself for nothing, as after twenty years of married life she is no nearer reaping the golden harvest hoped for, while she is herself getting on in years. To make matters worse, her only son, Herrick, has fallen in love with a penniless daughter of the people. Lady Joan very ingeniously divides the lovers, and the girl goes away and becomes one of the Redemptorines, or Red Sisters. How she is rescued before taking the final vows readers must discover for themselves, as the main interest of the story centres round the fortunes of Herrick Gaskell and his sweetheart. Meanwhile, Joan's husband meets with a terrible accident; and while he lies dying in one room of the castle, the life of the old millionaire is flickering out in another. Now the awkwardness of the situation for Lady Joan is this: if her husband dies first, she inherits not a farthing under his will; but if the old man can be persuaded to go first, she comes in for a vast fortune. Under the stress of a terrible temptation, she assists the old millionaire out of existence by a dose of poison. But the wealth thus seized upon turns to worse than ashes in her hands. She falls into the grasp of a villain, who suspects her secret; and in the end it is made known to her son and to Father Elliot. The latter has a painful interview with her; and, unable to bear the worm gnawing at her conscience, Lady Joan terminates her own life by flinging herself down a pit shaft. The narrative has not much brightness in it; but we can scarcely agree with Father Elliot that "Life is all sadness, from the hour in which we struggle into it with tears to the hour in which we struggle out of it with no tears left to shed." Indeed, he contradicts his own pessimistic deliverance by anticipating a happy union between Herrick Gaskell and his long lost sweetheart as well as between M. Van Zandt and young Lady Honor, who furnish, together, what humour the story contains. If this novel has a moral, it is obviously the old and yet ever true one, "Be sure your sins will find you out."

Capt. Hawley Smart is scarcely up to his usual mark in Beatrice and Benedick. As a rule he is a vivacious writer, but the intellectual champagne in this instance is rather flat. The modern Beatrice is Frances Smerdon, and the modern Benedick Colonel Byng. The romance is chiefly concerned with the Crimean War, which arose at a time when people "might as well expect to see a Quaker in the prize ring as Great Britain intervening by arms in any of the quarrels of Europe." But she did intervene, nevertheless, and at a terrible cost to herself in blood and treasure. Byng went out to the Crimea with his friend Hugh Fleming (engaged to a more charming girl than Miss Smerdon), and the fortunes of the story oscillate between the heroes in the Crimea and the heroines in England. Byng and Fleming go through severe fighting, and the latter is reported "missing." After a time he turns up again, to find that his deeds and honours are chronicled in the Gazette. All ends happily for both couples, although Fleming has nearly fallen a victim to the wiles of a fascinating Russian adventuress. Among the other characters are Dr. Lynden, a spy in the pay of the Russians, and a policeman named Tarrant; but they are rather wooden automatons. The story as a whole is readable, in spite of its defects.

Clement Barnold's Invention is all about a clever youth, the grandson of an earl, who draws up with much skill and labour the plans of a great invention, only to have them stolen. In one moment he loses the work of years: more than this, he is supposed to lose his life while at sea, and his suspected murderer is his bosom friend

Edward Morton, who has long loved his wife in secret. However, things come right at last. Barnold is not dead, and the wicked deeds of those who would have robbed him of his patents are exposed. Earl Barnold, a scientific dilettante, is very amusingly drawn.

By a singular coincidence, The Bantams of Sheffield is also the story of a patent. Only in this case the talented young inventor is obliged to dispose of his rights for £500, in order to procure medical assistance for his poor wife. Afterwards, when he desires to repurchase his own patent, he is asked £25,000 for it. This story has a rough kind of cleverness in it, and its pictures of Sheffield life are very realistic.

Mr. Stockton is amusing and original as usual in The House of Martha. A rich young American, who has travelled in Europe, can get no one to harken to the story of his wanderings on his return to New York, so he advertises for a good listener. Then he wants an amanuensis, and engages a pretty young thing from a kind of ladies' home called the House of Martha. His love-making with his golden-haired secretary is really a very pleasant bit of comedy. The author has a whimsical way of looking at everything, which keeps the reader's attention alive. He says many good things, and it is impossible to feel dull in his company.

Lilian and Lili is the story of two cousins. One, Lili, is the daughter of a reckless young Englishman and a French mother. Her father has been disinherited by his own father, a wealthy Yorkshire squire, and the estates have passed to Lilian, daughter of his younger brother. Both brothers are dead when the narrative opens. The characters of the two girls are well differentiated. Lili comes over to England to her cousin; but she is too French in her manners and feelings ever to be acclimatised, so she is glad to get back to gay France in the end, and to forego her chance of succession to the English estates. The story is entertaining enough, though in no respect striking.

Sensational to a degree is Mr. Cobban's short story Sir Ralph's Secret. It is somewhat improbable for a baronet to be the head of a gang of daring thieves, but this is not the only extraordinary thing about Sir Ralph. Those who are fond of excitement can revel in it here to their hearts' content.

GIFT BOOKS.

The Last of the Giant Killers; or, the Exploits of Sir Jack of Danby Dale. By J. C. Atkinson. (Macmillans.) The great and well-deserved success of Canon Atkinson's Forty Years in a Moorland Parish ought to secure attention for this little volume, in which the author has worked up the suggestions afforded by genuine local tradition into a story of giants and fairies, the scene of which is laid among the hills and valleys surrounding his own home. The first three or four chapters, we learn from the Preface, were not written for publication, but for the entertainment of the children belonging to the families of some of the author's friends and neighbours. These early chapters are not the best in the book;

when they were written Canon Atkinson does not seem to have attained to a proper degree of faith in the reality of his own creations, and there are even some untimely reminiscences of archaeological science, which surely the writer of a fairy story is bound to forget as completely as possible. But the chapter that tells of the adventures of "Sir Jack" with the Worm and the Erne is really fine. The "Worm" and the "Erne" are the Dragon and the Falcon in King Arthur's standard, which, when a rash intruder disturbs the repose of Arthur and his knights in their hall beneath Freeburgh Hill, came to ghastly life, and wrought havoc all through the country side, until they found a victorious adversary in the heroic Jack. There is abundance of inventive power and a touch of poetic imagination in this episode, which is told in an admirably appropriate style. The level is fairly maintained in the concluding chapters. That the book is eagerly read by children we can testify from actual experiment.

Stories from Fairyland by George Drosines, and the Cup of Tears and Other Tales by Aristotelle Kourtidios. Translated from the Greek by Mrs. Edmonds. (Fisher Unwin.) Mrs. Edmonds is to be thanked for bringing these tales to the notice of English readers. It is refreshing to find that a modern Greek anthology is a possibility, and that there is still an author with the name of Aristotle. If it were not for the information conveyed by the title-page, the nationality of these pretty tales would be scarcely suspected. In reading them one is reminded of other authors than the Greek—of Hans Christian Andersen, for instance, of Mme. D'Aulnois, and of the authors of the Arabian Nights. There are fables and allegories and sentimental stories of poor and sick children and others to which the title of the book is, perhaps, the most appropriate that can be found; although, as Mrs. Edmonds does not fail to point out, there are no fairies in the Greek mythology. We like them all; but if we were to choose our favourites, we should name "The Maiden's Three Gifts" and "The Enchanted Fountain" by Mr. George Drosines, and "A Hero's Statue" by Mr. Aristotelle Kourtidios.

Held Fast for England: a Tale of the Siege of Gibraltar. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie.) Mr. Henty's tales scarcely need any recommendation to boys. They are always full of just the sort of incident most delightful to young people of an adventurous turn. Daring escapades, travels, shipwrecks, battles, burglars, and everything else that is romantic and exciting, succeed each other in his lively pages, and keep up a "breathless interest" to the close of the volume. A healthy moral tone and a gentlemanly spirit pervade the whole, and the parent and guardian is further conciliated by the chapter of real history with which the narrative is always interwoven. In the present case this chapter is the Siege of Gibraltar (1779-83), which affords plentiful opportunity for the display of the hero's virtues on sea and shore. Happy the boy who shuts himself up with this book for more than one delightful hour, and even those not young will come out braced and refreshed by a pleasant plunge into its pages.

In the Wars of the Roses. By E. Everett-Green. (Nelson.) The historical novelette is rarer than it was, as authors begin to appreciate the difficulty of this style of writing. It is too apt to degenerate into the language of the comic characters in Shakspeare. Mrs. Green has avoided these pitfalls, and put together an interesting story of hairbreadth escapes and effusive loyalty in the midst of the rapine and treason which stalked through the land about 1470. The book ends with the foul murder of the young Lancastrian prince after the battle of Tewkesbury. It may be questioned whether some of the phrases used are not anachronisms, such as the expression with reference to a young soldier, "you have the right grit in you." Mrs. Green's careful study of the turbulent period in which she places her characters is much to be commended. The horse in the frontispiece wears the bridle of a modern steeple-chaser, rather than the heavy accoutrements of a mediæval charger.

The Red Grange. By Mrs. Molesworth. (Methuen.) We have read stories by Mrs. Molesworth which we prefer to The Red Grange, but it is too full of life and character—and of imagination also—to be classed with ordinary Christmas books. It begins well, with the picture of the apathetic little orphan alone at school, and the sudden awakening of her affectionate nature by the love of her uncle Rupert. But she is rather a prig, and we confess to no belief at all in her dream about the picture. That the "black boy" should appear in it would be conceivable enough, as he is the descendant of the bad Rupert of the picture; but why the "white boy," who had nothing whatever to do with it? Nor do we think it very wholesome to spice a story of this kind with such made-up supernaturalism. This sort of romance is out of place in a tale for children, which they are intended to accept as a true picture of life; and, moreover, it is not well done. That the fatal picture should be stowed away in the cover of a box is improbable, that a glimpse at it by Cora should cause her to swoon is extravagant; and after all the interest of the story is not in the least increased—indeed, it is rather damaged—by this foolish piece of canvas. The interest, however, is not very great; and though the characters are fairly well drawn, none of them have much substance. The best things in the book are the gradual ripening of Vera's girlish love for the "white boy" into something stronger, and the contrast between her and her friend Cora.

Uncle. By Jean de la Brête. Edited by John Berwick. (Dean & Son.) The words and deeds of the artless Reine in Jean de la Brête's story are the very opposite of what would be the acts and sentiments of an English maiden. The one blurts abroad and is openly proud of her love, the other would jealously repress it. Fancy the latter writing to a clergyman that when she is a grandmother she shall tell her grandchildren that the earliest and most delightful discovery which she made on beginning life was that she had a pretty face. Yet the study of the French girl is consistent throughout, and no one need wonder that sixteen large editions of the original book were sold in seventeen months. The Curé is a delightful character. Mr. Berwick's English is sometimes singular, as when he speaks of "the major portion of her body."

A Local Hero. By Austin Clare. (S.P.C.K.) Though the plot and denouement of A Local Hero have often been used by novelists and story-tellers—notably by Emile Louvestre, in one of the most pathetic of his beautiful stories—the author of this work has given us an interesting and well-told narrative, full of dramatic incident and natural pathos. The story is a little spun out, and thereby lacks the power which results from concentration; but there is no denying the unusual beauty and interests of several of its features and episodes. Among the most touching of the former we may point out the author's tender sympathy with dumb animals, as illustrated in his charming description of the dancing dogs Nigra and Bianca. We have rarely seen a better attempt at a diagnosis of what we must call, for want of a better phrase, the canine mind. There are, however, other features of the book not altogether so pleasant and edifying. Of course one expects in a publication of the S.P.C.K. a churchlike tone. All its stories are based on the explicable however fictitious foundation that only one form of religion exists in England, that of, in modern parlance, the Anglican branch of the Church Catholic. Nonconformists and their ministers are rarely suffered to appear, or if they are, are condemned to play a secondary and ignoble part. A decade or two ago the presentation of the Church in a S. P. C. K. story was, however, both more picturesque and indubitably more wholesome than it is in the present day. Then the reasonable and socially elevating character of the clergy were brought to the forefront. Churches were regarded more from the standpoint of the antiquary and the landscape painter, though with no diminution of their religious significance. Now, however, all this is changed; it is now the sacerdotal function of the Church and its clergy that is emphasised: the old benevolent and learned rector or vicar has given place to "the smooth-shaven young priest arrayed in a violet stole"; the simple adornment of the communion table has advanced to an altar adorned with crucifix and candlesticks; the singing of the congregation is monopolised by a male and surpliced choir. If the S. P. C. K. were merely a private society, all this ritualistic propaganda would not signify much. But the society, we need hardly say, is supported largely by contributions drawn from all classes of Churchmen alike, and for the most part three-fifths of its subscribers never read the popular stories issued at their expense; and therefore it seems only fair that reviewers should point out the change which is taking place in the publications of the society, and afterwards leave its subscribers to act as they choose.

An Inca Queen. By J. Evelyn. (Sampson Low.) This is a story full of the wildest and most exciting adventures, somewhat in the manner of Mayne Reid or Fenimore Cooper. It is well written and well illustrated; and notwithstanding the startling improbabilities and surprises with which it abounds—perhaps even because of them—will, we have little doubt, become a favourite with high-spirited boys.

In Aboveboard, by W. C. Metcalfe (Nisbet), the young reader will be enraptured with more than the usual incidents of seafaring life. Tempests, icebergs, sharks, hairbreadth escapes, fires, and fights at sea, culminate in a pirate ship, flying the orthodox black flag with skull and cross bones, and commanded by a captain with a kind heart seldom found in real life. The story is excellent throughout. The title vouches for its tone and morality. By the way, why does the author, in page 3, speak of a man as "trustworthy," and immediately add "and reliable," a word which is at all times a barbarous vocable and, if it means anything, is identical with the good old "trustworthy"?

HAPPY the boy who is presented with The Ice Prison, by F. Frankfort Moore (S.P.C.K.) It is a capital sea story, with the rush and savour of the brine flying through every page. There is a lengthy sojourn among Antarctic icefields, and Barry Blake forms an excellent hero. The way in which he escapes from the ice-prison is most ingenious.

In The Buffalo Runners (Nisbet) Mr. Ballantyne is at his best. What "old boy" has not been delighted by the long succession of his stories? Here there are once more Sioux Indians, trappers, hunting, and shooting as of old, with a murder and, of course, a love story thrown in, and all ends happily. Long may the veteran author be spared to delight boyhood, at the same time that he instructs it in simple faith and devotion to duty. Is it true to Redskin morality, however, that an old brave should decry revenge? If so, the motive for many a romance of the future will be cut off.

Heroisms in Humble Life. By L. G. Séguin. (Religious Tract Society.) The French Academy, from a bequest of M. de Montyon, devotes annually about £800 to reward instances of rustic industry and philanthropy. The authoress, who died before finishing this book, was intimately acquainted with French rural life, and has put together some dozen stories from the records of the Montyon Prize. These are carefully told, with much sympathy for honest work and charitable endeavour; and from their virtuous aims, and strong contrast of French with English life and manners, form an excellent gift book.

The Dalrymples. By Agnes Giberne. (Nisbet.) This is a long drawn-out—indeed, too long drawn-out—story of the kind which its author produces in such numbers and with such marvellous rapidity. There is a great deal of goodness in it, and also a fair amount of what seems the reverse of goodness, and is all the more attractive on that account. Hermione, the true heroine of The Dalrymples, is represented as having what, in other circles than her own, would be termed "a devil of a temper." It is, or is represented as being, to her credit that she conquers it; and as a reward Harry Fitzalan proposes to and is accepted by her. But the outburst of temper which is witnessed by the shocked Harry will seem to the most level-headed readers of The Dalrymples to be not only natural, but justifiable, as a revolt against a fussy and interfering woman. The transformation of Harvey Dalrymple, with the help of suffering, into a just if not an unselfish man, has a much more human look than Hermione's conversion. But there is no doubt whatever as to The Dalrymples being a book of the kind that the admirers of its author delight in.

Stimson's Reef. By C. J. Hynes. (Blackie.) This is a boy's book, full of the most startling episodes and adventures, among them being the marvellous discovery of a pirate's hidden treasure, and the renewed exploration of a supposedly exhausted gold mine, which is found to abound with nuggets. It is to be hoped that excitable lads fond of adventure will not be led away by such fictions to suppose that pirate's treasures and nugget-bearing gold mines are ordinary incidents in modern life; otherwise the bitter realisation of the gulf between the "world" of boys' books and the real world of living men may provoke a sceptical distrust in other directions. The author writes in a light and humorous style, but he is not a good story teller. His narrative is too abrupt, and has too many ill-jointed chinks and unfilled gaps. Apparently, he is one of the many writers of children's books nowadays who have never learned that a really well-told story is a veritable work of art.

My Lady Bountiful. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet.) The plot of this story is well devised. A boy and girl from Australia arrive at a kinsman's house in England, and by the exercise of kindness and sympathy work much good around them. A thin love story runs through it. The reader's interest never flags; but a rector in real life would hardly say "you and your sister."

Evenings Out: or the Amateur Entertainer. By Constance Milman. (Griffith, Farran & Co.) Miss Milman has written a very readable and useful little book on village entertainments, for which many a country impresario will be grateful. As a simple record of facts from the writer's own experience, it shows what can be done in the way of promoting rational amusement without elaborate expenditure either of time or money. Concerts, penny-readings, wax-works, theatricals, tableaux, &c., are treated of in turn, and admirable hints are given as to their management.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that Mr. A. J. Butler, formerly of the Education Department, but now with Messrs. Longmans, has been appointed to the post at Messrs. Cassells, vacant by the death of Mr. John Williams. Mr. Butler, who is a son of the Dean of Lincoln, is well known as a Dante scholar. He at present has in the press a translation of the Inferno, with a commentary, uniform with his editions of the Purgatorio and the Paradiso.

UNDER the title of the "Chiswick Press Editions," Messrs. C. Whittingham and Co. propose to issue a series of select English Classical Works, preference being given to such as are not easily obtainable in a separate or satisfactory form. The volumes will be printed at hand-press on handmade paper, in crown octavo size, from new type of the "old-style" character, and will be illustrated (when practicable) with an engraved frontispiece. The opening volume will be a reprint from the first edition of Fielding's Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, with an introduction and notes by Mr. Austin Dobson. An engraved portrait of Fielding will be included; and the impression, limited to 500 copies, will be ready early in the new year. The following gentlemen have undertaken to edit further volumes of the series: Mr. George Saintsbury, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. H. Buxton Forman, Mr. David Hannay, Dr. Richard Garnett, Mr. Joseph Knight.

MR. R. W. GILDER, perhaps best known on this side of the Atlantic as the editor of the Century, is about to issue a fourth volume of verse, as a supplement to those which have already appeared under the titles of The New Day, The Celestial Passion, and Lyrics. The new volume will be called Two Worlds and Other Poems.

A NARRATIVE of the Life of Alphonso XIII., the boy king of Spain, has been prepared by Frances and Mary Arnold Forster, and will be shortly published by Messrs. Cassell & Company, under the title of Born a King. The work will contain a number of anecdotes of the babyhood and boyhood of the little monarch, and will be illustrated.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON announce for publication a new novel by Miss Augusta A. Varty-Smith, author of the remarkable and pathetic study of north-country life, The Fauces and Garods. The scene of the new work, Matthew Tindale, is likewise laid in a Cumberland valley.

THE "short story" makes rapid advances into every form of serial publication. At the beginning of the year, we understand, it will take its place, at all events occasionally, in one of the gravest of the art monthlies, Mr. Huish having secured for the January number of the Art Journal a tale of art life by perhaps the most eminent of the younger French literary critics, M. Jules Lemaitre; and, for the February number, a short story by Mr. Frederick Wedmore, which Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen will illustrate.

THE next volumes in Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.'s "Social Science Series" will be Poverty: its Genesis and Exodus, by Mr. J. G. Godard; and The Trade Policy of Imperial Federation, by Mr. Maurice H. Hervey. A translation of M. Ostrogorski's new book, La Femme au point de vue du Droit Publique, which has just been crowned by the Faculté de Droit of Paris, is also to appear in the same series at an early date.

MESSRS. CASSELL & COMPANY will shortly publish an English edition of Pierre Loti's new work, Le Livre de Pitié et de la Mort.

MR. WILLIAM CARTWRIGHT NEWSAM, author of Reveries, Rhymes, and Rondeaux, has nearly ready for the press another volume of poems, to be entitled, "Thoughts in the Twilight."

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS are about to issue a further instalment of Mr. Henry Adams's History of the United States, in nine volumes. The two new volumes will cover the period of the first administration of James Madison, from 1809 to 1813.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish immediately a new edition of Dean Church's Oxford Movement, uniform with their cheap series of his works, which does not, however, include his sermons.

MESSRS. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. will publish next week a second edition of Mr. R. Le Gallienne's Book-Bills of Narcissus, which has been out little more than two months.

A SECOND edition of Mr. Arthur Turberville's Types of the Sainly Life is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

AFTER the December number, Mr. Edward Arnold will cease to publish the National Review. The January number will be issued by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co., Limited, of Waterloo-place, the original publishers of the magazine.

Literary Opinion for December will contain a poem entitled "Who Goes Home?" (on the close of the last parliamentary session) by Mr. H. Smith Wright, M.P. for Nottingham; also articles and poems by Lady Dilke, "Tasma," Mr. J. Ashcroft Noble, Mrs. Patchett Martin, Mr. Gilbert Parker, &c., and a portrait of Miss Christina Rossetti, after the drawing by her brother.

MR. HENRY IRVING has been elected vice-president of the Elizabethan Society. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will read the next paper, on December 2, his subject being "Richard III."

MESSRS. SOTHEY will be engaged in selling next week a collection of books brought together from several quarters, among which we need only specify a further portion of the library of the late J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps. But the remainder include lots precious to bibliophiles of all classes. Here may be found examples of the rarest first editions—such as Foxe's Book of Martyrs (perfect as to the text); the earliest Protestant translation of the De Imitatione (apparently unknown to bibliographers); the only genuine edition of Gil Blas published by the author; Tennyson's Timbuctoo; and two rare pieces of Swinburne—Cleopatra (1866) and Sienna (1868). Here, too, are many books super-illustrated on the Grangerian system, with portraits, scenes, autographs, &c.—Madame de Sevigné's Letters, with no less than 2624 illustrations; and Chambers's Book of Days, augmented from four to twelve volumes. There are besides many examples of the most sought after work of both French and English book-illustrators; Americana, including the earliest poetry written (though not printed) in America, and several productions of Franklin's press; a black-letter quarto entitled All the Famous Battells that have been Fought (1575), with the autograph of Oliver Cromwell and the book-plate of Lord Fairfax; and, finally, a set of Gould's ornithological works.

SOME who are interested in the history of the newspaper and periodical press in Europe may be glad to be directed to three valuable articles, "Antigüedad é importancia del periodismo Español," by Don J. P. Criado y Dominguez, which have appeared in the Revista Contemporánea for September 30 and October 15 and 30. They conclude with a bibliographical list of works of former writers on the subject in all parts of Spain.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

CONVOCAATION at Oxford has passed a vote of thanks to Mr. G. J. Romanes for his liberality in giving to the University an annual sum of £25, for a lecture to be delivered once a year on some subject, approved by the Vice-chancellor, relating to science, art, or literature—in fact, analogous to the Rede Lectureship at Cambridge.

THE Rev. R. C. Moberly has been nominated by the Crown to the chair of pastoral theology at Oxford, vacant by the appointment of Canon Paget to the Deanery of Christ Church. Mr. Moberly, who is the third son of the late Bishop of Salisbury, was educated at Winchester and New College, and was for several years a senior student of Christ Church. He was also for some time principal of St. Stephen's House at Oxford, and of the Sarum College.

THE death is announced of the Rev. Dr. Evan Evans, who had been Master of Pembroke since 1864, and thus (after the Dean of Christ Church) the oldest of the Oxford heads. He graduated (with a second class) in 1835, being a year senior to the late W. G. Ward, and a year junior to the late Dean Church. He served the office of Vice-chancellor from 1878 to 1882. He seems to have been best known for his patronage of all athletic sports.

THE following is the text of an invitation addressed by the Chancellor and Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, to other universities to attend the celebration of their tercentenary next year:—

"Tribus iustis saeculis iam feliciter peractis, postquam hoc Collegium Sacrosanctae Individuae Trinitatis iuxta Dublinum a regina Elizabetha conditum est, occasionem tam laetam festo ritu celebrare constitimus, atque Universitates orbis terrarum nobilissimas in partem gaudii nostri vocare. Idcirco vos, quos longis maris et viarum spatiis divisos vinculum tamen studiorum communium nobis arcte adnectit, pro humanitate vestra impense rogamus ut aliquos doctos viros ex vestro illustri coetu adlegetis, quos hospitio libenter accipiamus per dies festos quos indiximus in quintum usque ad octavum Julii, MDCCCXCII; oramusque ut certiores nos faciatis quos adlegaveritis."

MR. W. J. WOODHOUSE, of Queen's College, has been elected to the Craven Fellowship at Oxford, which is now practically a travelling fellowship in classical research, of £200 a year, tenable for two years. At the same time, the archaeological studentship at the British School of Athens was awarded to Mr. C. C. Inge, of Magdalen.

Two public lectures were to be delivered at Oxford on Thursday of this week—by Mr. F. T. Palgrave, the professor of poetry, upon "Sir Philip Sidney"; and by the Rev. W. Eustace Daniel, the Grinfield Lecturer, upon "Quotations of the Septuagint by Clemens Romanus."

MR. FREDERIC NIECKS—described as "of Dumfries," and best known as the biographer of Chopin—has been elected to the professorship of music at Edinburgh, vacant by the resignation of Sir Herbert Oakley.

PROF. BICKELL, so well known to Orientalists and students of the Old Testament, has been transferred from Innsbruck to Vienna University, where he is already lecturing as a member of the philosophical faculty.

THE draft charter of the teaching university for London is to be brought before the annual conference of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, to be held at Gresham College to-day (Saturday). Mr. J. Spencer Hill, hon. treasurer of the Chelsea centre, has given notice of his intention to move that the council be requested to petition Parliament against the charter—not only on the ground that the proposed scheme ignores the university extension movement, but also because it is inimical, on the face of it, to the free development of higher education.

WITH reference to a note under this heading in the ACADEMY of last week, Prof. Margoliouth (as librarian) writes to us that the library of New College possesses one copy of the Basle edition of Diogenes Laertius (1533); and that therefore the one offered for sale must have been a duplicate with which the college parted some time before 1850.

By a stupid confusion, we ascribed last week the music for the performance of "The Frogs" of Aristophanes at Oxford to Dr. Charles H. Lloyd, instead of to Dr. Hubert Parry.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

PRELUDE

To a new and enlarged edition of Poems, which Mr. Heinemann will publish in January next.

THE mighty poets from their flowing store
Dispense like casual alms the careless ore;
Through throngs of men their lonely way they go,
Let fall their costly thoughts, nor seem to know.—
I cannot scatter thus, with hand profuse:
Look for no showering largess from my Muse!
A fitful presence, seldom tarrying long,
Capriciously she touches me to song—
Then leaves me to lament her flight in vain,
And wonder will she ever come again.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM HENDERSON.

ALL anglers and collectors of folk-lore would notice with regret the death of one who had delighted them with his books more than a decade ago. William Henderson spent the early years of his life in Durham as an industrious man of business; but from boyhood, as he has told us, he seized every opportunity of fishing in the Border rivers, especially in the Tweed. Soon he went further afield, gathering angling anecdotes and scraps of folk-lore wherever his steps took him. Late in life he gave to the world his two volumes of peculiar interest, one of which had before been printed privately for his many friends, and the other buried in the numbers of the Monthly Packet. 1879 thus saw the issue both of the Folk Lore of the Northern Counties and of My Life as an Angler (see ACADEMY, Nov. 15, 1879).

Few men have exceeded Mr. Henderson in kindness, and a gracious cordiality which won him troops of friends, while his private life was blessed with much happiness, and his unceasing efforts were spent in ameliorating the lot of the poor wherever he resided. A day's fishing always possessed wonderful charms for him, and I well remember the delight with which, neither of us having ever caught a grayling, he drove me from Ashford Courts to the village which Sir H. Davy's pen has created the locus classicus for his capture, Leintwardine, on the Teme. We had only one rod, and I insisted that he should catch the first, which he accordingly did, with much enthusiasm. Mr. Henderson cherished strong antiquarian tastes, and was a devoted admirer of nature. He passed away at the age of seventy-nine, at Stratford-lea, Worthing. Multis ille bonis febilis occidit.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

IN the November number of the Livre Moderne M. Octave Uzanne announces the fate of that periodical which, as he threatened or promised, is not to outlive its second year. But there will be balm in Gilead, and L'Art et L'Idée will rise from the ashes of the Livre Moderne as that did from those of Le Livre. May we express a hope that this new-comer will not be exclusively "modern," but will return to the good practice by which the Livre itself mingled old and new. Meanwhile, the penultimate number of the Livre Moderne shows that it is not decrepitude that will cut it off. Besides minor matters, it has two articles of unusual interest. The first is a discussion on contemporary bookbinding, with a very large number of examples in illustration. Some of them are extremely pretty; in fact, we are inclined to think them a little too "pretty." Bookbinding is, or should be, one of the severer arts; and while it can hardly be too rich or too stately, it may easily be too much ornamented. However, the modern taste does not much affect severity. The other is a collection of Baudelaire's letters—love-letters, but as modest as a maid's in expression for the most part, addressed to the heroine of "A la très bonne, à la très belle," which some think not the worst love-poem of the last fifty years. We suspect, rather than know, that they are samples of a volume which M. Lévy is to publish, and which should have much interest.

IN the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for November, Fernandez Duro decides in favour of Watling Island as the San Salvador on which Columbus first landed; he also gives some interesting details of the lives of the Mallorcan cartographers, especially of Jafuda Cresques, "lo jueu buxoler," the Jew of the compass, who, after his conversion, passed into the service of Portugal at the end of the fourteenth century. Some fifty Latin letters of Arnaldo Descos, also from Majorca, are printed by Father F. Pita. They date from 1483 to 1495, and give a vivid picture of the life of a scholar of the Renaissance, of the exaggerated value attached to Raymond Lull's writings and to Latin composition. A collection of inedited documents on Cuba tells of attacks of corsairs in 1538, 1542, and 1544.

SPECIAL QUOTATIONS WANTED.

QUOTATIONS are wanted for the following words. Where a date stands before a word, an earlier quotation than that date is wanted; where a date follows, a later instance is wanted; for words without a date all quotations will be welcome. Every quotation should be furnished with as full a reference as possible to date, author, work, edition, volume, chapter, page, &c., and sent to the editor, addressed, "Dr. Murray, Oxford."

N.B.—The dates do not represent the earliest or latest quotations actually in hand, but the points before or after which further instances are wanted.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF COWPER.

Cowper School, Olney, Bucks: Nov. 25, 1891.

I think your readers will be interested to know that for some time I have been engaged in collecting, annotating, and arranging in chronological order the correspondence of the poet Cowper, with a view to publication. The work is fast approaching completion, and stands before me at the present moment in ten bulky volumes (a local bookbinder having so put them together for my convenience), the printed letters and the copies of those in MS. all in proper order.

The best collection hitherto published is, of course, that of Southey, which (appendix included) contains all the letters that are in Grimshawe, except four or five, and a large number besides. Southey, moreover, whenever it was possible, printed the letters entire; whereas his rival not only gave them in a mutilated form, but also, in many instances, omitted the very cream. Southey's misfortune was that in most cases he was not permitted to see the originals, but had to content himself with the portions to be found in Hayley. Consequently, even in Southey, the letters appear very imperfectly. Grimshawe, however, who did see, or could have seen, the majority of the originals, was far and away the greater sinner. Moreover, being debarred from the so-called "Private Correspondence," Southey was unable to give the letters in consecutive order. Then, too, a number of letters have been brought to light since Southey's time. These are scattered up and down the pages of a dozen different books and periodicals. Lastly, I have a goodly number that have not been printed at all. Altogether, there are in my possession about 400 letters that are either not in Southey or of which Southey gives only scraps.

I should be exceedingly obliged if persons possessing originals would communicate with me, for every letter ought to be re-examined. It may not be generally known that a certain amount of material (which I have made use of) was collected by the painstaking John Bruce, with a view to a publication of a similar nature to the one I am engaged upon. Mr. Bruce died, however, before the work had proceeded far.

THOMAS WRIGHT.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "DISMAL."

Cambridge: Nov. 21, 1891.

At last the etymology of this difficult word is definitely and finally settled.

In a paper read before the Philological Society (November 4, 1887), I suggested that the old notion of connecting "dismal" with Lat. dies malus may be right after all, if we refer to the Anglo-French plural form dis mal, i.e., dies mali, the evil days, and take these to mean the famous dies Aegyptiaci, the unlucky days; a notion started in Minshew's Dictionary long ago (see Brandt's Antiquities, ed. Ellis, ii. 48; Dies Aegyptiaci in Ducange; Chambers's Book of Days, i. 41; Cockayne's Leechdoms, iii. 77; and compare the M.E. phrase "in the dismal," for which see my Dictionary).

Of course, what we require is evidence. This has been supplied us by Mr. Paget Toynbee, whose information leaves nothing to be desired. For the phrase actually occurs in an Anglo-French MS. of the respectable date of 1256. In speaking of the unlucky days, a certain author says:

"Ore dirrai des jours denietz
Que vous dismal appellez;
Dismal les appellent plusours,
Ceo est a dire, les mal jours."

Here we have the explicit statement that dis-mal is the same as mal jours; as well as the use of the plural form mal.

The passage occurs at fol. 100c of MS. Q. 9.13, in the Hunterian Museum at Glasgow. It is printed as an extract in a description of the MS. by M. Paul Meyer, at p. 129 of Documents Manuscrits de l'ancienne Littérature de la France: Rapports à M. le Ministre de l'Instruction Publique par M. Paul Meyer; première partie; Paris, Imprimerie Nationale, 1871. The name of the author of the A.F. poem is Rauf de Linham, who wrote it in 1256. It thus appears that this important passage was printed twenty years ago. Our thanks are due to Mr. Toynbee for the reference, and to M. Paul Meyer for the note of the facts.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

P.S.—I note, also, that there is an important unprinted Latin and French glossary in MS. R. 7.14 in the same library. It gives, for example, the entry: "Hoc typatium, canfrein," in a section "De Equis." This is the E. "chamfrein." Also: "Hoc stillicidium, gutere"; E. "gutter." Again: "Hec tequila, sengle"; E. "shingle." Both of these last are in the section "De partibus Domus."

"MEN-TURANNOS."

London: Nov. 19, 1891.

In Herondas v. 77 the beginning of the line is thus transcribed ο . . . μητυραννος. The prefixing of one letter will give Μητυραννος, which I think is almost certainly the true reading. What should precede, is a much more debatable matter. Μα Μητυραννος would scan and make sense, and would about occupy the vacant space. An inscription of the second century B.C. found near Cape Sunium describes the building of a temple to Μην Τύραννος and contemplates the association of ερασισταί. The same god was, according to Foucart, figured on imperial coins of nearly all the cities of Phrygia, Lydia, and Pisidia, and on many of Pontus, Pamphylia, and Caria. He also appears on a stele in Asia Minor with a Phrygian cap and a crescent on the shoulder; the crescent is found at Colossae and Philippi. The prevalence of the worship may also be inferred from the name of Tyrannus of Ephesus mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. There is almost a certainty that a cult, thus spread on both sides of the Aegæan, would find a lodgment in the islands, which swarm with names imported from the East by the Phœnicians. Pataesciscus derived from the Pataeci is an example.

The running of the two words into one name, Μητυραννος, can hardly be considered a difficulty.

It is probable that the common noun τύραννος was derived from the same god at a much earlier stage of the Greek language. Tir-anna, according to Prof. Sayce (Trans. Society of Biblical Archaeology III. 206), was the name of the Pole Star among the Babylonians; but the star was also called Idyan-same, "judge of heaven." The similarity of "judge" and "ruler" is obvious of itself; but it is emphasised by the Judges in Palestine and the Suffetes at Carthage. Therefore τύραννος, for which Curtius attempts no Greek derivation, is very nearly identical in form and meaning with the Babylonian Tir-anna.

The addition of Men, combined with the crescent, points to the Moon in place of the Pole Star—a kind of transference extremely common in astral mythology. But the Moon continues masculine, as in Babylonian.

NEWLY DISCOVERED FRAGMENTS OF PHILO.

Neu Entdeckte Fragmente Philos. Von Paul Wendland. (Berlin: Reimer; London: Nutt.)

If some very substantial portion of the works of Philo hitherto lost and not known in Greek were to be on a sudden "rescued from the Syrian sands," there would be a considerable stir in the learned world. Dr. Wendland's rich find of Philonian Fragments lacks the dramatic interest which would attach to it if it had happened in the manner described; but his merit is all the greater for the painstaking research which led him actually to such good results. Guided by a hint thrown out by Prof. Rendell Harris, in his Fragments of Philo, Dr. Wendland, after making diligent search in old Bible Commentaries and Florilegia already published, turned his attention to an unedited Munich MS. written in the eleventh century, containing the Commentary on parts of the Old Testament of Procopius of Gaza, the great Christian Sophist of the sixth century, as Dr. Wendland calls him. Equipped with an ample knowledge of Aucher's Latin translation of the Philonian

Commentaries preserved in Old Armenian, and thoroughly familiar with Philo's style, Dr. Wendland has detected, scattered up and down the hitherto unedited Munich Catenæ, a host of fragments of Philo's great Commentary.

The old Armenian version, which contains, Θεία τύχη, just those parts of Philo which have disappeared in Greek, has been of the same service to Dr. Wendland as it was to Prof. R. Harris in giving a clue to the proper sequence and order of the fragments found, as well as because it gives incontestable evidence of their authenticity. Procopius simply copied out without acknowledgment whatever of Philo's Commentary he thought appropriate; and, no doubt, that Commentary has been lost in the original Greek, just because, all the best bits of it having been copied into Catenæ in the sixth and following centuries, it was not thought worth the while of scribes to continue to copy out so lengthy a work any more.

Dr. Wendland's discovery lends a new and unique interest to these old Patristic Catenæ, which are wont to be rather despised and thrust aside; for it shows that there may lie hidden in them we know not how much of early Christian, even of pre-Christian writers. What light may be thrown on the origins of Christian doctrine and belief will be seen from a fragment like the following, which Dr. Wendland has unearthed from another MS., in which it masquerades under the name not of Philo the Jew, but of Philo the Christian Bishop.

Φίλωνος ἐπισκόπου: πρῶτον ἐναργῆς πίστις ὅτι δι' ἕνα ἄνδρα δίκαιον καὶ ὅσιον πολλοὶ ἄνθρωποι σώζονται· δεύτερον ἐπαίει τὸν δίκαιον ἄνδρα, ὡς μὴ μόνον ἐαυτῷ περιτεποιηκότα ἀρετῆν, ἀλλὰ καὶ παντὶ τῷ οἴκῳ· δι' ἣν αἰτίαν καὶ σωτηρίας ἀξιοῦνται.

The same thought often meets us in the parts of Philo preserved in Greek; but the genuineness of this fragment, as of nearly all the others which Dr. Wendland now gives to the world for the first time, is established by the fact that we find it word for word in section 11 of the second book of the Armenian Quaestiones in Genesis of Philo.

Besides these fragments of the allegorical Commentary upon Genesis, Dr. Wendland has found and here publishes a new and hitherto lost portion of Philo's treatise on the Sacrifice of Animals, from a Laurentian MS. of Philo, as well as portions of the lost work de Ebrietate. The type and paper of the volume are excellent; and the care given to the text, and the erudition of the author's critical remarks, are beyond all praise.

SCIENCE NOTES.

At the last meeting of the Zoological Society, a communication was read from Mr. H. Neville, urging the importance of founding an experimental zoological station in the tropics, and advocating the claims of Trincomalee in Ceylon for such an institution.

MR. JOHN B. VERITY has written a book on the production and application of electricity to light, power, and traction, entitled Electricity up to Date, which will be issued next week by Messrs. F. Warne & Co. It will be fully illustrated, and will also contain a map showing the districts allotted to the various London supply companies.

DR. LINDSAY'S Climatic Treatment of Consumption has been translated into French by Dr. F. Lalesque, of Arcachon, who has added some valuable material of his own. A translation of the same work into Polish is about to be undertaken by Dr. Neugebauer, of Warsaw.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

ON the occasion of M. Joseph Derenbourg's eightieth birthday, his former pupil, Prof. James Darmesteter, has dedicated to him a little pamphlet, entitled Une Prière Judéo-Persane (Paris: Cerf). The main substance of it is a new translation into French of a Parsi prayer to Ormuzd, which Prof. Sachau had previously edited from a very incorrect MS. in the British Museum. Prof. Darmesteter has been able to revise this from two versions, in Gujarathi and Persian, printed at Bombay. The special interest of this prayer is that it contains the following thanksgivings:—

"O Creator, I thank Thee for that Thou hast made me an Iranian, and of the true religion. . . . Thanks to Thee, O Creator, for this, that Thou hast made me of the race of men; . . . for this, that Thou hast created me free and not a slave; for this, that Thou hast created me a man and not a woman."

The identity of these thanksgivings with three in the daily morning litany of the Jews is at once apparent. Prof. Darmesteter then goes on to inquire whether the Parsis borrowed from the Jews, or vice versa. He first examines the Parsi prayer, and shows from internal evidence that it was originally written in Pehlvi, and that it dates from the national dynasty of the Sassanides (226-652 A.D.). He then, with the assistance of the Grand Rabbi of France, proceeds to determine when the corresponding thanksgivings first appear in the Jewish ritual. They can, in substance, be traced back to the Palestinian period. They are first found in the Menahot (43, b), which ascribes them to Rabbi Meir, disciple of Rabbi Ahiba, who flourished in the first half of the second century A.D. The original form of one of the thanksgivings was: "Blessed be God, for that he has not made me ignorant." But, according to tradition, a Babylonian Rabbi of the fourth century, hearing his son use this form, caused him to change it to the less boastful one which still prevails: "Blessed be God, for that he has not made me a slave." As this is also the formula found in the Parsi prayer, Prof. Darmesteter concludes that the whole was borrowed from the Jews. The date of the borrowing he would place in the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century, when Jewish doctors are known to have been all-powerful at the Sassanide court, under Sapor II. and Yazdegerd.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY. — (Wednesday, Nov. 11.)

MR. J. W. CLARK exhibited and made remarks upon two fragments of sixteenth-century book-cases, found in a lumber-closet at Clare College after the late fire. It was explained that the library was originally over the old chapel, which occupied the same position as the existing one, though it was not so large. The library is known to have been fitted with new cases in 1627. When the old chapel, and with it the library, was pulled down in 1767, these cases were removed to the present library, which had been built in 1689, and fitted with shelves against the walls "à la moderne," as Cole calls it, at some period between that date and 1742. In the course of removal the cases were a good deal altered; and the discovery of these fragments shows that they had originally been furnished with desks. No indications, however, of chaining can be discovered; and it was therefore suggested that the desks had been added, because it was usual at that period to make book-cases with desks, even though the special reason for their presence might no longer exist. It was further shown that the old library had fifteen cases, and a plan of it, with their probable arrangement, was exhibited. — Prof. Hughes described the results of his examination of some deserted Indian villages in Arizona, one of which consisted of caves excavated in the top of a small hill of lava, and another of dwellings built under the shelter of overhanging ledges in the cliffs of the Walnut Cañon, much resembling the cliff dwellings of mediæval times along the rivers of Dordogne. He exhibited a collection of matates or grindstones, of arrow heads, pottery, &c., from these localities, and other objects in illustration of the points to which he called special attention. He arrived at the conclusion that there was no reason for referring these dwellings to any remote period. Criticising the evidence for the existence of palæolithic man in America, he pointed out that it was believed by those competent to form an opinion that, in all the cases in which it had been stated that implements, &c., had been found in ancient gravels in America, there were marks of tunneling and digging into the base of the gravel cliff, and that the objects had been simply buried in the talus and infilling debris. He then described the genesis of a spear or arrow-head as learned from the Indians, and showed that each specimen passed through several stages, in the first of which it was only rough dressed and resembled palæolithic types, but was gradually more and more finished till it assumed the form of the neolithic instrument of Europe or the fine pointed arrow of America, and that palæolithic man had not manufactured a different form, but only stopped at an earlier stage in the same process of manufacture. This was suggested by the palæolithic forms picked up in the neolithic workings of Grimes (Graves or Cissbury), but was proved by observations among the North American Indians. He further exhibited specimens from La Ganterie and Pressigny in illustration of the same view, and pointed out that these inquiries helped to explain away the great gap supposed to exist between palæolithic and neolithic types of flint implements, but did not affect the question of the enormous interval between the earliest appearance of man and neolithic or recent times, the belief in which was founded on geographical, climatal, and biological evidence.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY. — (Thursday, Nov. 19.)

THE HON. G. C. BRODRICK, in the chair.—MR. C. W. Oman read a paper on "The Πολιτεία τῶν Ἀθηναίων." No writer of repute had doubted that this was the work familiar to Plutarch, Pollux, Harpocration, and other ancient writers. No fewer than 55 out of 158 quotations which were made from the book were found in this text. It was another question whether the book was actually the work of Aristotle, on which he would not express an opinion. Some continental writers had pronounced it to be the actual work of Aristotle. But the question of style was a difficult one; and the style of the Ethics was widely different from that of the Politics. Cicero speaks of Aristotle's style as "easy and flowery"; after such an opinion it was not wise to be dogmatic. Certainly this work, though scarcely written in the brilliant style which some had ascribed to it, was not so crabbed as the Ethics, but simple and straightforward. It was probably the work of one of Aristotle's pupils. There were pretty accurate indications of the date of this manuscript; and the reference to quadrimemes, and the absence of mention of quinquimemes, pointed to fifteen years during which the former alone were used. The inference was that the work was compiled not earlier than 329 B.C. It was singular that no mention was made of the constitutional reforms between 400 and 329 B.C. The book was badly arranged, and showed a great want of critical judgment. In some respects it directly contradicted Herodotus and Thucydides, and failed to supply the deficiencies in the latter. The writer seemed to be actuated by an unaccountable prejudice against Pericles. He evidently had access to State documents, and particularly to the draft constitution of the Four Hundred. It was certain that Aristotle himself would not have made such omissions of matters of the highest importance. There was no mention of Hyperbolus or Alcibiades; but there was a confused account of the Four Hundred. In matters of difference between them, the inclination of scholars would naturally, and probably rightly, be in favour of Thucydides. The political opinions of the author were not consistent, though he clearly inclined to oligarchy. He spoke in one place of the few as more corruptible than the many, and he even referred to the εὐθωρία πραότης τοῦ δήμου. On the other hand, he says of Nicias that he was βέλτιστος τῶν πολιτευσάμενων—an opinion which it is quite certain that Aristotle would never have expressed. With respect to Draco some somewhat startling statements were made, as he was spoken of as a constitutional reformer. It was Draco, according to the book, and not Solon, who gave a democratic tendency to the government of Athens; and the account given of the Areopagus and of the relative positions of the Archons and the στρατηγοί was very different from the views hitherto entertained. Mr. Oman then critically examined in detail several important questions, and pointed out with reference to Draco that in the Politics he was expressly said by Aristotle not to have made constitutional changes. This view was difficult to reconcile with the views of the Πολιτεία, though it was possible that a popular assembly, founded on the Homeric ἀγορά, already existed in Draco's time.—In the course of the discussion that followed, Mr. Hubert Hall, director, observed that he had found a reference to some political work of Aristotle in a fourteenth-century chronicle, which appeared to be identical with the newly-found treatise.

FINE ART.

A History of the "Old Water-Colour" Society,
By John Lewis Roget. In 2 vols.
(Longmans.)

OUR first feeling on closing these two monumental volumes is one of congratulation to the author in bringing his long and laborious task to so successful a conclusion. It was one which in many ways resembled that of Horace Walpole, when he attempted to dress the memoranda of Vertue into something like a history of the English school of painting down to his own time. Like Walpole, a great part of the material had been collected by another—in Mr. Roget's case by the late Mr. Joseph Jenkins, the once well-known member of the "Old Water-Colour" Society; but Mr. Roget's undertaking, if not of greater interest, has been of greater labour, and he has brought to its execution a more serious sense of his responsibility as an historian.

Although there is nothing to suggest that Mr. Roget's labour has been uncongenial, it must have required no little patience; and this and other qualities becoming to the historian, such as method and self-restraint, are possessed by Mr. Roget in no ordinary degree. For he has not had to write the history of an art alone, but the history of a Society also, and in writing the latter, his power of selection has been very limited; for though he has been able to treat the more interesting members at greater length, he has been obliged to say something of all without indulging in even comparative depreciation of the most insignificant. In thus sinking the judge in the historian, and choosing for the most part to express the opinions of others rather than his own, he has probably deprived us of much valuable criticism; but he has set an example which may be followed with great advantage by future chroniclers who are not such competent critics as himself.

But the book is yet much more than a methodical arrangement of facts relating to the Water-Colour Society. It is a history of the whole school till those comparatively recent times when the Society ceased to absorb all the best water-colour painters of England. Mr. Roget has exercised good judgment in tracing the development of this specially English branch of the art, from its beginning in the last century with the "draughtsmen" who were employed to illustrate those archaeological and topographical works in which our great grandfathers delighted, down to the art of to-day; and he has shown perhaps equal sense in not going farther back, not even to the washed drawings of the Dutch in the seventeenth century. If he had so chosen, he might have included Dürer and Rubens and Rembrandt—even the artists of ancient Egypt—in his view; but he was to write the history of the "Old Water-Colour" Society, and wisely began with that fresh and truly national impulse which resulted in its formation. Of the period before the little group of water-colour painters took heart to separate from their more favoured brethren of the Royal Academy and set up an exhibition of their own, we have fortunately no little information; but its history has never been so fully and fairly set out as in the first two books of Mr. Roget's first volume. Perhaps Mr. Roget might have said a little more of Taverner and Samuel Scott; but no one will grudge the space which he devotes to Paul Sandby and John Cozens, nor yet to "Warwick Smith," whose share in the development of the water-colour art has scarcely been sufficiently recognised. Even the latest of those beautiful drawings of Italy given by Sir Walter Trevelyan to the South Kensington Museum is not later than 1795, and the earliest is as early as 1786, when Turner and Girtin were not yet in their teens. Mr. Roget is well justified in treating him together with J. R. Cozens; but he is careful to point out that, though Smith was but three years older than Cozens, the technical change in practice which he introduced did not take place until the career of Cozens had virtually ended.

An interest, fresher if not so deep, attaches to the subsequent chapters, in which the notes of Mr. Jenkins and others begin to leaven the narrative. We are told, on the authority of the late Mr. John Pye, that Dr. Monro bought Turner's youthful drawings from his father at two guineas apiece; and here is a new anecdote of Turner, told to James Holland by Dr. Burney. The Doctor and Turner met at Dr. Munro's sale. "I understand," said Turner, pointing to some of the lots to which his own name was attached, "that you have the bad taste to admire these things more than I do now." "It will be sufficient for me to say," answered the polite connoisseur, "that I admire everything you do, Mr. Turner." "Well," returned the other, a little flattered, "perhaps they are not so bad for half-a-crown and one's oysters." This was in 1833, and Turner evidently thought they were "not so bad," for he bought back a good many of his own drawings at the sale. Of the good Dr. Thomas Monro, who gave Turner and Girtin their oysters and their halfcrowns for a night's sketches, any new information is interesting. It appears from one of Girtin's drawings in the late Percy collection, that he had a house at Fetcham in Surrey as well as the better known ones at Bushey and in the Adelphi-terrace; and one of Mr. Jenkins' notes tells us that he had a netting in his carriage in which he always slipped a folio of drawings when he went to this country house. This Thomas Monro was certainly a mad doctor, for he was physician to Bethlehem Hospital; but we doubt the oft repeated statement that he attended George II I. No the least interesting of the new stories about the doctor is contained in a footnote, where his opinion is recorded that Turner was "blunt, coarse, vulgar, and sly." Mr. Roget has the admirable habit of giving his authorities for all his statements. In this instance it is John Pye, and it was Cornelius Varley who told Jenkins that Dr. Monro used to employ Turner in tinting Girtin's outlines, and that Girtin complained of this as not giving him the same chance of learning to paint. Unfortunately the "news" about Turner and Girtin is not great or important, but Mr. Roget's account of the latter is full and excellent. It is to be hoped that it will give the final blow to that libellous view of his character which was circulated by the jealous Dayes and repeated by the not too good-natured Edwards.

From a strictly literary point of view it may be doubted whether Mr. Roget was justified in inserting so long a biography of Nicholson. No doubt the space allotted to this artist is out of proportion to his comparative merits; but we quite sympathise with the author's hesitation to cut down more severely an authentic MS. which gives us such a fresh view of the "state of art" in the north of England during the latter half of the last century, and such a strong instance of the stubbornness of the artistic temperament which so often "finds its way out" in spite of natural obstacles that seem insurmountable. But Nicholson was a Yorkshireman, and shrewd as well as gifted. His MS. throws also much light on the "trade tricks" of the dealers in his days, the forgeries in which they were aided by unscrupulous artists, and the impositions to which the Society of Arts was exposed—by their committee of drawing masters—who practically awarded the premiums to the drawings of their own pupils touched up by themselves. In the following chapters much new and interesting information of a biographical character is given about Joshua Cristall and John Glover. Of the latter's individuality we get a lively picture. Though eighteen stone—"a mountain of a man"—and with club feet, he would perform dangerous feats of climbing, vaulting from rock to rock, and dancing on giddy ridges; and he appears to have been a rival of St. Francis of Assisi in his power over wild birds. His present reputation as a painter in oils is perhaps somewhat higher than Mr. Roget allows.

Mr. Roget's matter is necessarily mainly biographical. The book may be said to consist of a series of biographies strung on the thread of the Society's history, and it takes all Mr. Roget's ingenuity to make it bear the weight. The reader may often be tempted to wish that Mr. Roget's task had been to write a history of the art of water-colours, instead of that of the Royal Society. The two histories move on parallel lines, and Mr. Roget has not neglected either; but the progress and changes of the art, in technique, in subject, and in sentiment, would have afforded a stronger thread and a greater argument for the chronicler than the slight changes in constitution, the succession of presidents, and the exits and entrances of members. The exigencies of his scheme have obliged Mr. Roget to divide his narrative into chronological sections corresponding with the presidencies, and to cut up his biographies into similar sections. This arrangement is destructive of biographical continuity, and interrupts the reader's interest in the careers of the different artists to a very considerable extent. Nor does it improve the value of the work as a book of reference for art students, as they will be less concerned with the progress of the Society than with the progress of the painters. The biography of John Varley, for instance, is cut up into no less than four strips; the first begins on p. 165 of the first volume (which contains 558 pages), and the last instalment does not conclude till the thirty-first page of the second volume. It is only fair, however, to add that this disadvantage is minimised by the excellence of the index, which is in itself quite a valuable little warehouse of information, and by the very full and careful synopsis of contents which acts as a ground plan of the maze.

But if we accept as inevitable this solution of continuity, which takes place not only in the biographical threads (for the biographies in their turn interrupt the sequence of the history), the book deserves little but praise. The somewhat complicated machine is most carefully constructed, and moves continuously and evenly, if at slow speed. Mr. Roget's style is clear and simple, and is animated with many a touch of quiet humour, which makes us feel that there is a competent individuality behind the whole work, though it never obtrudes itself. Moreover, the subject matter is so interesting in detail, and contains so many excellent anecdotes, that it has scarcely a dull page. For nearly all the more celebrated of the water-colour men were "characters" in their way, and their records are delightfully full of unsophisticated human nature. With what labour Mr. Roget has constructed some of his most amusing passages may be instanced by the following:

"He [John Varley] used to say himself that whatever money was put into his pocket was sure to run out at the bottom. The latter defect arose in some measure from the careless generosity of his disposition; and it appears to have been aided as a source of extravagance by the habits of his first wife, and the conduct of a sometime son-in-law. For himself, he lived from hand to mouth, never put by a farthing, and indeed was always in difficulties. But he declared that his home troubles, 'which would have worried any other man into his grave, were beneficial to him, as just preventing him from being too happy.' On Linnell's asking him one day, how he was getting on, he answered, 'Much better, much better: there are only four men, I think, now, who could put in executions.' A friend met him one day racing along at great speed, somewhere near Cavendish-square, and would have stopped him, but Varley pushed by, saying, 'I am in great haste, I cannot stop now. I have found a man who only takes 35 per cent!' The Messrs. Redgrave relate that Varley had an original way of getting paid by rich but forgetful debtors—a way, he used to say, which saved the unpleasantness of law. 'I send in a new bill,' said the painter, 'making a mistake of a guinea or two against myself, and the money comes in directly.'"

The information contained in this short passage comes from three separate sources—Gilchrist's Life of Blake, Redgrave's Century of Painters, and Jenkins' Notes—and the book throughout is a mosaic of fragments from a hundred sources. This, perhaps, is a sufficient excuse for an imperfect notice of its contents, as it would be impossible within a reasonable space to examine how far it adds to our knowledge. With regard to many of the greater names the published material is ample. The additions made, for instance, to the Lives of De Wint, David Cox, and Müller could but be slight; but, on the other hand, we have welcome news of Geo. Barret, Junr. (whose birthdate has at last been settled within a few months), of John Varley and Cotman, of William Hunt and Cattermole, and of many other later and lesser names. With regard to some of the latest, especially those who are yet alive, the biographies are mainly if not entirely fresh. It may be doubted whether it might not have been wiser, it would have certainly abridged the writer's labours, if he had confined his record to deceased artists; but his task was to write the history of the Society, and he has done so almost down to the very day of publication.

Of the way in which he has done it we have only to add that it is a thoroughly good piece of work, worthy of the illustrious Society it commemorates, of the exquisite art with which it is concerned.

COSMO MONKHOUSE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE question of the site of Mr. Onslow Ford's statue of Lord Strathnairn is likely, it is understood, to come before the committee for their final decision to-day (Saturday). London does not rejoice in the possession of so many excellent statues that the subject of the placing of one of them can afford to be a matter of indifference to any of its citizens. In the present case several sites have been proposed; but it is believed that the one which has seemed likely to be selected—the not precisely central region of Belgrave-square—is that which, if finally settled upon, would, in all probability, afford the least satisfaction. The artist himself and many art lovers are understood to be averse to this site; and we may confidently hope that, before it is too late, a majority of the committee will see their way to the choice of a spot more appropriate and furthersome.

A FAMOUS gold cup, which is stated to have been, until the period of the early Stuarts, among the Crown jewels, and which was latterly in the possession of Baron Pichon, of Paris, and which passed many intervening generations in a convent at Burgos, is likely—it is announced in the Standard—to become once more the property of the nation, by purchase aided by gift. The dealer whose property this unique vessel is at the present time is willing if not desirous to cede it at cost price; while more than one eminent amateur has come forward with the promise of a most handsome contribution towards the acquisition of this very precious and desirable object. We are ourselves informed that the cup in question is, or has lately been, lodged in the British Museum—where it may not perhaps be precisely on public view—and that a high official there is interesting himself greatly in its acquisition.

THE exhibitions to open next week include (1) the thirtieth winter exhibition of sketches and studies by members of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, in Pall Mall East; (2) the New English Art Club (which we erroneously antedated last week), at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly; (3) a collection of drawings made by various artists for the Portfolio, and also drawings by Mr. Railton of Westminster Abbey and by Mr. Edward Hall of Tennyson's country, at the Japanese Gallery, New Bond-street; and (4) a series of pictures by Mr. Thomas Blinks, entitled "Field, Turf, and Cover," at Messrs. Tooth's Gallery, in the Haymarket.

IN pursuance of one of the principal objects of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers, which is to place before its members the best examples of the great masters of etching of past times, the council announce their intention of following up the Rembrandt and Turner collections of 1890 and 1891, by including in the society's forthcoming exhibition, in March next, a selection of the etchings of Vandyck. They also announce that no applications for associateship in the society can be received after Tuesday, December 22.

THE series of Cantor Lectures at the Society of Arts for this season will begin on Monday next, November 30, when Mr. A. P. Laurie is to deliver the first of a course of three upon "The Pigments and Vehicles of the Old Masters," dealing with fresco painting, gesso work, and gilding in the fifteenth century.

THE Indian Magazine and Review for December will contain an article on "The Antique Gems of India," by Lieut. General George G. Pearse; and also one by Surgeon-Major Hendley, entitled "Suggestions to Indians in regard to the Preservation of their Indigenous Arts."

WE would call attention to an excellent piece of work which is being carried on at Alexandria. For the past three years a periodical, called the Rivista Quindicinale, has been published there every fortnight, which contains archaeological articles of the highest interest, as well as a record of the discoveries of inscriptions and other ancient monuments found from time to time in Alexandria and its neighbourhood. The larger number of these articles are from the competent pen of Dr. Botti. The Rivista is the organ of the Athenaeum, which, under the presidency of Sir Charles Cookson, has just entered on its second lecturing season, and is engaged in establishing a library and museum specially devoted to the remains of Greek and Roman antiquity discovered in Egypt. The want of such a museum has long been felt, and Alexandria is the most appropriate locality in which it could be placed. Negotiations have been carried on with M. Grébaud for the removal from the Cairo Museum of objects belonging to the Græco-Roman period, most of which are still lying unpacked on the floors at Gizeh.

THE November number of the Ex Libris

Journal contains a brightly written article, by Mr. John Leighton, upon "The Ship in Ex Libris." Nothing lends itself more readily to ornamental effect than the rich complexity of the sweeping curves of the timbers and sails of an antique barque, as witness the noble fifteenth century seal of the Earl of Huntingdon. The present paper is illustrated with some excellently decorative book-plates, such as those of John Scott Russell, the naval architect and constructor of the Great Eastern, and of Sir Oswald Walter Brierly, marine painter to Her Majesty.

THE STAGE.

We live in an age when the author acts (see Mr. Christie Murray, for example) when the author manages, when the manager writes, and when the actor manages—when, indeed, everybody assumes, "with a light heart," somebody else's duty. Miss Grace Hawthorne is, it would seem, the latest convert to the theory of the necessity that a cobbler should no longer stick to his own last. This actress has turned dramatist—if to compose a new last act for a drama now in course of performance be indeed to turn dramatist. Miss Hawthorne has furnished a final scene for Mr. Willis's "Royal Divorce," in which, it will be remembered, she herself impersonates the Empress Josephine. We shall confess that, having heard something from the qualified as to the character of this literary performance, we have not been eager to put ourselves in a position in which we must either have enjoyed or been disturbed by it. In other words, we have not thought it necessary to repair to the Olympic.

"THE PLANTER" having—although undoubtedly with some good qualities—been a failure at the Prince of Wales's, the stage there is to be immediately occupied by the exponents of "Miss Decima" and of "The Prancing Girl." "The Prancing Girl" is a new travesty; and it is worthy of note that the removal of "Miss Decima" from the Criterion to the Prince of Wales's gives occasion to Mr. Charles Wyndham to re-appear at his own theatre, where in his lighter vein, in Mr. Bronson Howard's "Brighton," he will be as welcome as he was last summer in the justly popular "David Garrick."

MUSIC.

OPERA AND CONCERTS.

A SECOND hearing of "Le Rêve" last week revealed more of its power and charm. There are undoubtedly strange harmonies, and progressions which set at defiance laws and tradition; for M. Bruneau felt his subject strongly, and at times expressed himself extravagantly. There are Beckmessers who will fill you a slate full with his faults and failings; but the composer, like Walther, has something within him which outweighs them all: he has true dramatic instinct and imagination. It has been said that the opera owes much of its success to its gifted interpreters, but surely they owe much to the work; it seems, indeed, as if they had been inspired by it to do their best. It would be dangerous to predict popularity for "Le Rêve"; and yet the striking impression which it has made in a short time, and the very diversity of opinion respecting its merits, are favourable signs. Whatever be its fate, it is a remarkable work.

Sir C. Hallé commenced a series of orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Friday week. Once again the Hallé band, with the veteran conductor at its head, displayed its many excellent qualities in Weber's "Obéron" Overture, Beethoven's "Eroica," and the Andante from Spohr's "Power of Sound." An orchestral sketch by the Russian composer Borodin, entitled "In the Steppes of Central Asia," was quaint, though somewhat monotonous. Sir C. Hallé played Schumann's pianoforte concerto; but his reading of the work lacked warmth and true sentiment, and the technique was not all that could be desired. Sir Charles is, as a rule, note-perfect, and therefore this was all the more noticeable. The attendance was far from good. There was no vocal music in the programme, and no Wagner; yet nowadays these are generally found to be magnets wherewith to draw the public.

Miss Fanny Davies made her first appearance this season at the Popular Concerts last Saturday, and gave an admirable rendering of Beethoven's "Les Adieux" Sonata. It is a great pleasure to find that success has not spoilt one of our best pianists. She is always more occupied with the music than with herself; there is no show, but an honest attempt to interpret according to the intentions of the composer. Schubert's Quartet in D minor was given with marked precision and fine feeling by MM. Straus, Ries, Gibson, and Popper. The soft yet rich tone of the last-named, and his masterly command of his instrument, were displayed to advantage in two 'cello solos. Miss Fillunger sang Schubert's grand song "Die Allmacht" with artistic taste and expression, but the music is far more suitable to a man's voice.

Señor Sarasate gave his last concert on Monday afternoon. Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata was performed by him and Mme. Berthe Marx; but in spite of some fine playing, the music did not produce its full effect. A cleverly written Suite for violin and pianoforte by Carl Goldmark and a Sonata for the same instruments by Saint-Saëns gave the two performers many opportunities for display; both works, in fact, were brilliantly rendered. The Saint-Saëns Sonata shows a ready rather than an inspired pen. Mme. Marx played Chopin's seldom heard "Polonaise Fantasia" with too much of the French and too little of the Slavonic element: in Chopin's music both are essential factors. She gave a clever performance of Rubinstein's "Etude in C." The programme ended in a brilliant manner with some Slavonic dances of Dvorák's. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Herr Stavenhagen gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, but his programme was not of the best. The Chopin selection was not a strong one, and the pianist's tone seemed veiled in some of the cantabile passages. He played the A flat Polonaise by way of encore, and in this piece his tone was decidedly hard. Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26) was, on the whole, well rendered, but the first two movements were more satisfactory than the last two. The Liszt selection also lacked interest. The Melodie Polonaise is fairly attractive, but Liszt's "Hexameron" variations are as tedious as they are difficult. They were announced as the composition of Liszt, but of these variations Liszt is supposed to have written but a single one. The matter, however, is scarcely worth discussion; the piece is not worth reviving. It was performed by Herr Stavenhagen with great brilliancy. Mme. Stavenhagen sang Mozart's "Deh Vieni" and some graceful Lieder in a most artistic manner, and had the benefit of her husband's accompaniment on the pianoforte.

Herr David Popper gave an orchestral concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening. Saint-Saëns' clever and showy 'cello Concerto in A minor was performed in a striking manner. A "Requiem" for three violoncellos, with pianoforte accompaniment, composed by Herr Popper, proved an interesting novelty. The music, as the title suggests, is slow and sombre; the principal theme has a good deal of character, but the form of the movement is scarcely satisfactory. With M. Delsart, the well-known Paris 'cellist, Mr. E. Howell, one of our best players, and last, but not least, Herr Popper as interpreters, it can easily be imagined that the piece was a grand success. Herr Popper afterwards played a Suite, with orchestral accompaniment, of his own composition. The slow movements are expressive, the "Gnomentanz" clever, and the "Elfentanz" a good show piece, but little else. Mme. Alwina Valleria sang songs by Lassen and Schumann with great artistic taste. The orchestra was under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

TEN CENTURIES of TOILETTE: from the French of A. Robida. By Mrs. Cashel Hoey. Illustrated in Colours by the Author. Small post 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

This work, published in the original with the title 'Mesdames Nos Aïeules,' is a picturesque history of dress in France from the earliest recorded time to the present. It reveals great research, the author has bestowed infinite pains upon it both with pen and pencil, and has rendered it attractive by his lightness of touch and his artistic treatment of the succession of fashions which, as he shows, at once derived character from, and imparted it to, the passing ages. The book is no less amusing than it is instructive.

THE LIFE of CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS: an Examination of the Historical and Geographical Conditions under which the Western Continent was Discovered to Europe; with an Inquiry into the Personal History of Cristoval Colon. By JUSTIN WINSOR, Author of "A Narrative and Critical History of America," &c. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 21s.

ON THE BORDER with GENERAL GEORGE CROOK. By JOHN G. BOURKE, Captain Third Cavalry, U.S.A. Fully Illustrated. Royal 8vo, cloth, 21s.

For upwards of twenty years Captain Bourke served under General Crook in the Wild West of America. The three principal campaigns of that distinguished soldier against the Apaches, the Sioux, and the Cheyennes are described in these pages with picturesque realism, and the book abounds with exciting adventures in connection with the suppression of these three distinct rebellions amongst the Indians.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN'S CORRESPONDENCE
 With the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, the late Charles Dickens, and others. Edited by FREDERICK CRAWFORD. With a Memoir of Andersen and Portraits.
 Andersen's letters to his friends, which have been looked forward to as a literary treat, have a genuine ring about them, and most of them appear to have been written without any thought of their being published. Their great charm lies in their simplicity.

Handsome bound, large post 8vo, 6s.
 BY PHILIPPE TONELLI.
RETRIBUTION: a Corsican Vendetta
 Story. Illustrated by R. André.
 "Mr. Tonelli's book has the advantage of being written by one who has been able to impart more of vivid local colouring to his sketches of Corsican peasant life than is found in other volumes."—Morning Post.

FRENCH SOLDIERS in GERMAN PRISONS: being Reminiscences during and after the Franco-German War. By Canon E. GUERS, Army Chaplain to the French Forces.
 The work is illustrated with portraits of the leading actors in these terrible scenes. The thrilling narrative helps one to realise the self-denial and heroism of those who gave up much of the comfort of this life to tend the sufferings of the sick, wounded, and helpless soldiers suddenly interned in fortress and hospital.

Large post 8vo, handsome bound, 6s.
SOUVENIRS of the SECOND EMPIRE; or, the Last Days of the Court of Napoleon. By the COMTE DE MAUGNY, formerly Minister for Foreign Affairs.
 This interesting volume of the reminiscences of a Cabinet Minister is full of anecdotes relating to all that passed amongst the Court and Society, the Clubs and the Theatres, in the reign of Napoleon III.; also numerous portraits and particulars as to the lives of all the celebrities of the period.

Handsome bound in blue cloth gilt, gilt edges, large crown 8vo, 3s.
DEAN'S FAIRY BOOK. A Companion to the "Doyle Fairy Book" (5s.).
 This volume, which makes a splendid Presentation Book for a child, contains most of the favourite fairy tales of childhood, drawn from Perrault, old Chap-Books, and the "Arabian Nights." The book is enriched with numerous excellent illustrations by Louis Murry, John Proctor, and other able Artists.

Crown 8vo, handsome bound, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.
The DOYLE FAIRY BOOK. Consisting of Twenty-nine Fairy Tales. Translated from Various Languages by ANTHONY R. MONTALBA. With 34 Illustrations by Richard Doyle, a Memoir of Doyle, and an Introduction by a MEMBER of the FOLK-LORE SOCIETY.

DR. WM. SMITH'S Classical and Latin Dictionaries.

"I consider Dr. Wm. Smith's Dictionaries to have conferred a great and lasting service on the cause of classical learning in this country."—DEAN LIDDELL.

CLASSICAL.

A DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN ANTIQUITIES; INCLUDING THE LAWS, INSTITUTIONS, DOMESTIC USAGES, PAINTING, SCULPTURE, MUSIC, THE DRAMA, &c. Edited by WM. SMITH, LL.D., W. WAYTE, M.A., and G. E. MARINDIN, M.A. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Vol. I. (to be completed in 2 vols.), medium 8vo, 31s. 6d. each.

This New Edition contains 800 pages more than the old Edition. One-third of the Articles have been entirely rewritten. The remaining two-thirds have been in all cases greatly altered; scarcely twenty have been reprinted as they originally stood. There are, besides, about Two Hundred Articles which did not appear in the old Edition, many of considerable length and importance, with 450 additional Illustrations.

A SMALLER DICTIONARY of ANTIQUITIES for JUNIOR CLASSES. Abridged from the above Work. Thirteenth Edition. With 200 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

A DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN BIOGRAPHY and MYTHOLOGY. By VARIOUS WRITERS. With 564 Illustrations. (3,720 pp.) 3 vols., medium 8vo, £4 4s.

This work contains a history of the Ancient World, Civil, Literary, and Ecclesiastical, from the earliest times to the Downfall of the Roman Empire.

A DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN GEOGRAPHY. By VARIOUS WRITERS. With 4 Maps and 534 Illustrations. (2,512 pp.) 2 vols., medium 8vo, £2 16s.

This work presents the Researches of Modern Scholars, and the Discoveries of Modern Travellers, including an Account of the Political History of both Countries and Cities, as well as of their Geography.

A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY of BIOGRAPHY, MYTHOLOGY, and GEOGRAPHY, for the HIGHER FORMS in SCHOOLS. Condensed from the above Dictionaries. Eighth Edition. With 750 Woodcuts. 8vo, 18s.

A SMALLER CLASSICAL DICTIONARY for JUNIOR CLASSES. Abridged from the above Work. Twenty-first Edition. With 200 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

LATIN.

A COMPLETE LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. With Tables of the Roman Calendar, Measures, Weights, Money, and Proper Names. Twenty-first and Cheaper Edition. (1,250 pp.) Medium 8vo, 16s.

This work holds an intermediate place between the Thesaurus of Forcellini and the ordinary School Dictionaries, performing the same service for the Latin language as Liddell and Scott's Lexicon has done for the Greek. Great attention has been paid to Etymology.

A SMALLER LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. With a Dictionary of Proper Names. Thirtieth Edition. Thoroughly Revised and partly Rewritten. By DR. WM. SMITH, and Prof. T. D. HALL, M.A. (730 pp.) Square 16mo, 7s. 6d. The Etymological portion by JOHN K. INGRAM, LL.D., of Trinity College, Dublin.

This Edition is to a great extent a New and Original Work. Every Article has been carefully Revised.

A COPIOUS and CRITICAL ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. Compiled from Original Sources. Fifth Edition. Medium 8vo, 16s.

This work is a more complete and perfect English-Latin Dictionary than yet exists. It has been composed from beginning to end precisely as if there had been no work of the kind in our language, and every article has been the result of original and independent research.

A SMALLER ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY for JUNIOR CLASSES. Abridged from the above Work. Fourth Edition. Square 12mo, 7s. 6d.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

Just published, New Cheap Edition, in 1 vol. demy 8vo, cloth, 10s.

THE HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH CONSTITUTION,

By Dr. RUDOLPH GNEIST, Professor of Law in the University of Berlin.

Translated by PHILIP A. ASHWORTH, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*• This Edition contains additional Chapters on the Parliaments of the Nineteenth Century down to the Third Reform Bill (1884-5), with an important Note giving the Author's views on the Irish Question, and a New and copious Index.

"As a history of the English Constitution for English readers Dr. Gneist's book has a great advantage over existing treatises. It is not too much to say that Dr. Gneist is indispensable to the student of English constitutional history. . . . And English students have every reason to be grateful to Mr. Ashworth for introducing them to so valuable a work."—Athenaeum.
"This book is a monument of German patience and industry. . . . Dr. Gneist's book ought to be on the shelves of every student of our constitutional history."—Saturday Review.

*• LIBRARY EDITION, 2 vols., demy 8vo, 32s.

SPACIAL AND ATOMIC ENERGY.

Part III.—HEAT.

By FREDERICK MAJOR.

Price 7s. 6d.

From a standpoint that matter (ethereal and terrestrial) varies only on account of the manner of its concretion into rigid atoms by enforced cohesion. Atomic and molecular forces attributed to respiration, imparted by ethereal gas energy and Gravitation to effects attending "respirative" rise and fall imposed upon the "earth's surface."

The cause of Atomic and Molecular Action, Terrestrial Heat, Dew-point Cold, the Tides, Expansion and Contraction of Gases, the Electric states, Latent Heat, Combustion, and Explosion explained upon the above principles without according innate elastic, attractive, or fluid qualities to any matter.

"This is a learned dissertation of some 600 pages on the important subject, Heat. The author avoids mathematical formulae, his intention apparently being to seek a full explanation of known facts by close reasoning. To effect his purpose he calls to his aid man's extensive knowledge of natural phenomena, taking his subject in a skilful and methodical manner. One of the most interesting chapters is that on 'Combustion,' and here the author's knowledge and literary power appear at their best. His views on the theory of combustion are readily understood. The atomic and molecular theories are naturally the subject of much discussion, as well as the relation of the different states of matter, and the cause which brings about change of state."—Glasgow Herald.
"The work is one of a thoroughly scientific character, and in his treatment of a hard subject the writer has been happy both in his style and his selection of illustrations and description of experiments. The volume on 'Heat' embraces the whole field of a great and most interesting subject, and students of science—particularly of applied science—will extend to it a thorough welcome."—Scotsman.

BRAND:
A Dramatic Poem.
By HENRIK IBSEN.

Translated into English Prose by WILLIAM WILSON.

"The greatest World-poem of the Nineteenth Century next to 'Faust,' of which it is, in a sense, the spiritual compliment. 'Brand' will have an astonishing interest for Englishmen. Its high solemn note will touch them very nearly. It is in the same set with 'Agamemnon,' with 'Lear,' with the literature that we instinctively regard as high and holy."
Daily Chronicle.

"There is no denying the power of 'Brand.' The figure of the hero almost startles us by its bigness and its unity, for one never asks if it is a possible character, but admires it as a type and as the embodiment of a great idea."
Glasgow Herald.

"Miss Robinson's book is strikingly realistic. Its strong situations are numerous, and treated with the graphic power that is a marked feature of all her productions."
Morning Post.

"Miss Robinson tells her story in clear, terse, and forcible English."
Globe.

"The incidents are recounted with a good deal of vivid pictorial imagination, and the patriotic sentiment of the book is beyond reproach."
Tablet.

"Althea is a decidedly clever study."
Glasgow Herald.

"'Hovenden, V.C.' has much in it that reminds one of Daudet's 'Sappho.' Without any of Daudet's deliberate and needless grossness, our author succeeds in effecting something of that deep moral impression which he undeniably effects."

LITERATURE.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT OXFORD.

The Colleges of Oxford. (Methuen.)The Early History of Balliol College. By Frances de Paravicini. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

FEW historical subjects can present more perplexities to their historian than the history of our two great English Universities: the Universities have been so weak, and their Colleges so strong, that it is most difficult to decide how far one should treat Oxford or Cambridge as corporate and united institutions, how far as clusters of single bodies.

The Colleges of Oxford is the outcome of a happy idea, due, it is to be presumed, to the historical genius of the editor, Mr. Andrew Clark. In twenty-one chapters each College is discussed by one of its members, but each from a particular point of view; so that the accounts of the Colleges, taken together, present a fairly complete account of all those great impulses and movements which have sprung indeed from some one College, or found in it their most typical illustration, but which have still influenced and moved the University as a whole.

The idea is felicitous, and it has been excellently carried out; but it will not be surprising if the book does not give full satisfaction to members of all the various Colleges. A Cambridge man could read it with perfect satisfaction, but the loyal members of the Oxford Colleges may sometimes feel that their own foundations have not always met with full justice. To any enthusiastic member of any among these twenty-one Colleges, Keble excepted, there will occur antiquarian curiosities of history, interesting matters of detail, personal anecdotes and traditions, familiar legends, and the like, which the historian of his College, fettered by the essential plan of the book, has passed over in silence. Strong as is the Oxford spirit of loyalty, still stronger is the spirit of loyalty to one's own College; and when the Oxford reader finds that his College has been treated merely as an illustration of some particular age or tendency, as exemplifying mediaeval discipline, or Renaissance study, or Catholic reaction, he will be likely to resent that treatment. To him the smallest scrap of College history is fascinating; he knows, to quote Newman,

"all about the College, from the curious show-books or the manuscripts in the library, and the number in full of old silver tankards in the buttery, down to the excellence of the pump-water, or the history of the common-room chairs."

It has taken Mrs. de Paravicini, so a Balliol man might exclaim, three hundred and sixty pages, without one superfluous word, with the most scholarly concentration, to tell the history of Balliol only so far as the Reformation; and here is Mr. Lane Poole disposing of Balliol's entire history in thirty-five pages. For such complaints of an inconsiderate patriotism, the editor and his contributors will be prepared; and, apart from such complaints, they will probably meet with little but approbation.

It is not easy to single out for particular praise any one chapter: all have great merit, and even the chapter upon Christ Church by Mr. Tyrwhitt, which is in some ways not quite satisfactory, is full of interesting matter. Perhaps the most successful are the chapters upon Queen's College by the Provost, upon New College by Mr. Rashdall, upon Lincoln by Mr. Clark, upon Corpus by the President, and upon Jesus College by Mr. Thomas. They seem to have a completeness and a weight of their own; while some of the other chapters, valuable as they are, tell us their story in a manner less happy and vigorous. Yet Trinity, Exeter, Wadham, and Worcester are hardly less fortunate in their chroniclers: except, in the case of Exeter and Wadham, in the limits of length imposed upon them.

The great impression left upon the reader's mind is an impression of Oxford's wonderful facility of achievement, in spite of, unless it be because of, her wonderful economy of method. It is curious, for example, to trace the history of Worcester, as recorded by Mr. Daniel: a College, latest in point of foundation, until the foundation of Hertford, but really dating from an antiquity greater than that of University, Balliol, and Merton. Through changes and lapses, experiments and developments, that College under various names and conditions has always been a place of learning since the year 1283, when it was established as a Benedictine School under Gloucester Abbey, in the same way as Durham College, the ancestor of Trinity, was dependent upon Durham Priory. One regrets the destruction of that older school and collegiate church of St. George, attached to the Abbey of Oseney; or, at least, that the tradition of learning there was not preserved in other forms.

But of greater interest than the continuity of learned establishments upon the same sites is the continuity of system and ideas shown by the various statutes. A Wykehamist may be pardoned if he tries to illustrate his meaning by reference to New College, seventh in order of antiquity among the colleges, founded in 1379. It is too much to say, as does Mackenzie Walcott, that Chichele, founder of All Souls', and a New College man, "literally copied" Wykeham's statutes; but he was greatly indebted to them. Waynflete, founder of Magdalen, and traditionally held a Wykehamist, framed his "regulations as to the dress, conduct, and discipline of the College upon those laid down in the statutes given by William of Wykeham to New College, from which society a Fellow, or former Fellow, might be chosen as President. Save for this exception, no one who had not been a Fellow of Magdalen College was to be accounted eligible for that office."

So writes Mr. Wilson, who also tells us that "Fox, Bishop of Winchester, closely imitated Waynflete's statutes in those which he gave to Corpus Christi College." Mr. Madan, writing upon Brasenose, says:

"As in conception and in form of buildings, so in respect of their statutes also, Merton and New College are the two cardinal foundations. From the latter were derived the statutes of Magdalen, founded in 1458, and from these latter the earliest statutes of Brasenose."

Mr. Hutton, writing upon St. John's, says that the statutes of St. Thomas White

"were substantially those of New College; and the return to the scheme of William of Wykeham, which had been so largely adopted at Cambridge, shows that the alterations made by the founders of Magdalen, Corpus Christi, and Trinity, were not felt to be improvements."

As regards the two former, Mr. Hutton's meaning is not quite clear: it seems more true to hold, with Mr. Shadwell in his chapter upon Oriel, that New College, Magdalen, and Corpus are "the three Colleges of William of Wykeham's type." Now, it would be impossible to find Colleges less like each other in history and in spirit than All Souls' and Brasenose, or than Corpus and St. John's: yet their statutes were all more or less directly taken from those of New College. Without claiming for Wykeham an exaggerated place, we are entitled to praise very highly the genius of that great prelate, whose statutes, drawn up with immense elaboration, the work of many years, could satisfy in no small degree the minds of so many various founders. Other Colleges have sometimes borne the popular name of "the New College": but to none has it been permanently applied but to the one which most deserved it, Saint Mary College of Winchester in Oxford. "Careful of the type," indeed, is Oxford; but she has also been "careful of the single life," and these few facts illustrate what I have called Oxford's fertility of achievement combined with her economy of method.

Consideration of space, and the like, have necessarily produced a certain cursiveness and even superficiality in touching upon various matters; and a few positive discrepancies, not of great importance, may be detected. Thus, Mr. Wells writes, that Wadham made over to King Charles an amount of plate "only surpassed by one other foundation." Mr. Oman tells us that "All Souls' contributed more than any other house save Magdalen." We should be glad to know which statement is correct. Among instances of cursiveness might be mentioned Mr. Rashdall's phrase, "the Sir Henry Wotton who still lives in Isaac Walton's Lives." Wotton lives quite as much in his own Reliquias: notably in his Elements of Architecture, a work of singular interest for artists or students of the Italian School, his few fine poems and his admirable letters, especially his letter to Milton, giving advice upon Italian travel and praising his poetry. Again, Mr. Oman, while rightly severe against Warden Finch of All Souls', gives him but the grudging merit of being "a man of sound learning." It is true enough that ancient dedications are apt to be no sure evidence of the characters either of him who confers or of him who receives that honour; but we are loth to number among fulsome dedicators John Norris the Platonist, "the English Malebranche," Herbert's successor at Bemerton. Dedicating, when Fellow of All Souls', his Miscellanies, he writes to Finch about

"The Greatness of your Quality, and Personal Worth, consider'd with that Happy Relation which has further endear'd you to us; 'Tis by your kind Patronage and Protection that our Studies prosper, and our laurels thrive and flourish, and that any of us are in a capacity to throw in the least symbol into the Muses' Exchequer. To whom then should the Fruits of this Sacred Ground be offer'd, but to that Sun by whose genial influence they grow and ripen?"

He adds, that he wishes the Warden to know "how well your (now more than ever fortunate) Society stands affected towards you." Norris would hardly have ventured to fly in the face of plain facts had the College been openly and notoriously hostile to Finch. In 1700 the Lower House of Convocation fell into an irregular way of sending to the Upper House, not the Prolocutor, but anyone they pleased; and when Finch came with a message, the Archbishop smartly snubbed him. Whereupon the Lower House objected to such treatment of their message, "especially when brought up by a person of the honourable Dr. Finch's quality." A ludicrous phrase; but not even the noisy clerics of that day would have insulted the episcopal bench by sending to them a mere drunkard, turncoat, and swindler. It is, perhaps, surprising to find Charles Reade duly set down among the glories of Magdalen, while there is no mention of Collins, who, with Addison and Gibbon, ranks among her greatest sons. And there is no apparent reason why Mr. Blakiston, giving 1818 as the date of Newman's election to a Trinity Scholarship, should add after it a note of interrogation. The date is not given in the Apologia, but it is fixed beyond a doubt by the lately published Autobiographical Memoir; and Mr. Blakiston gives no reason from the College Books for his hesitation.

Perhaps we may say that the mediaeval periods are the best discussed; and that there is some tendency to dwell upon the less favourable aspect of the eighteenth century. We are all familiar with Gibbon's account of Magdalen; but we are apt to forget, as Dr. Birkbeck Hill will remind us, the opposite accounts left, for example, by Johnson and by Edgeworth. Oxford in the eighteenth century was, doubtless, what Newman calls it: "a very dear place, but a very idle one." The cause of that somewhat bigoted affection and of that somewhat congenial idleness is plain enough. Mediaevalism was liberal; time passed, and Catholic humanism began to correct the faults of mediaevalism. Tudor and Stuart absolutism crushed the liberality of Catholic humanism; and after a time we hear no more of such men as Wolsey, More, Warham, Erasmus, Colet, Grocyn, Sir Thomas White, Sir Thomas Pope. But though the liberal spirit slowly died, the loyal spirit was corrupted into a spirit of illiberality: devotion to Church and State became a political prejudice, unenlightened by religious and rational ideas. What wonder that such scurrilous fellows as Terrae Filius, the notorious Nicholas Amherst, found plenty of abuses to castigate? Yet in that every century, Oxford never ceased to send forth men of the highest eminence: her dullards she was apt to keep at home.

The Colleges of Oxford is, indeed, a delightful book: learned and lively. To the casual reader, desirous of knowing a little about Oxford, one might recommend a study of this work, of Mr. Lang's pleasant gossip, and of Walker's Oxoniana. Since Shelley's period did not fall within the chosen limits of Mr. Conybeare's chapter, I may add, that Walker, a Fellow of New College, was the prime mover in Shelley's expulsion. To these works might be added a description of characteristic periods in Oxford history, the Life of Anthony à Wood, and Newman's Letters. But for a laborious and detailed account of the origin, growth, progress, of a single great College, there exist few books so excellent as Mrs. de Paravicini's Early History of Balliol. It goes no farther than the Reformation; and it gives an account, full yet admirably restrained, of the intentions of John de Balliol and of Devorguilla; of the various statutes, the developed discipline, the intellectual and material advance, of their great foundation. Accustomed as we are become to the fine and flashy writing of the day, to the tiresome pedantry of the learned, and to the fluent nonsense of the illiterate, it is hard to overpraise the perfect simplicity of Mrs. de Paravicini. Resolutely eschewing the superfluous, she has narrated, with careful accuracy and with rational sympathy, the chief incidents in the Catholic and mediaeval history of Balliol. A minute study of the book brings to light far more information than one would gather from a hasty reading; and the most ardent enthusiast for modern progress will be compelled to look back in gratitude upon those ancient days. But let us not provoke controversy: for still, as in old times,

Chronica si penses, cum pugnant Oxonienses,
Post paucos menses, volat ira per Angligenenses.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

Essays on English Literature. By Edmond Scherer. Translated by George Saintsbury. (Sampson Low.)

In addition to their general intellectual vigour and literary attractiveness, these essays possess a very rare and curious kind of interest. Everyone is familiar with the remark that for any literature the judgment of the intelligent and cultivated foreigner has some of the authority which belongs to the judgment of posterity—the authority conferred by that detachment which frees the critic from prejudices of proximity, and enables him to observe the object in other than local and temporary relations. The criticism of the foreigner has, indeed, one obvious advantage over the criticism of after ages, inasmuch as every generation can become acquainted with it and learn from it whatever it may have to teach. We cannot guess what will be said about the work of Lord Tennyson by English critics of the year 2000; but we may read what has been said of it by MM. Taine and Scherer, and compare with our own domestic criticism estimates which have the disinterested aloofness that can be attained by variety of environment as well as by lapse of time. It is probable that, could the verdict of posterity become known to us, it would seem not only strange but in many respects perverse; and it is certain that to the native there is almost always an element of apparent perversity in the verdict of the alien. It is not simply that his absolute or comparative estimates are perplexingly unfamiliar, but that the method by which they are arrived at has an appearance of whimsicality: its premisses seem irrelevant, its conclusions far-fetched and strained. M. Taine's History of English Literature produces just this kind of effect upon the intelligent Englishman. He feels its intellectual force, he admires its brilliancy; but to his thinking the former misses its goal, and the latter is effective to bewilder rather than to illuminate. In short, the standpoint of the Frenchman is so far removed from that occupied by himself and his neighbours that the identity of the most familiar objects is all but unrecognisable. It is as if it had been written in the book of fate, "He that is French let him be French still, and he that is English let him be English still; and between these two let there be a great gulph fixed, across which neither shall pass to the other side."

Now the essays of M. Scherer which deal with English literature have a special interest and attractiveness, in virtue of the fact that, while they embody the views of a singularly acute and well-informed foreign critic, and are therefore characterised by the detachment which domestic criticism can never achieve, they have none of that special foreignness of method and treatment which we discern so clearly in the History of M. Taine, and which is present, though with less aggressiveness, even in the English Causeries of the cosmopolitan Sainte-Beuve. Had this volume been published for the first time in an English translation with no author's name on the title-page, and with the omission of a few references which are accidental betrayals of nationality, even a shrewd insular reader might easily persuade himself that the voice was that of one of his countrymen. In Scherer's methods, in the canons which he implicitly accepts as axioms or postulates, and, most of all, in that pervading tone which is at once more impressive and more elusive than style itself, there is something most delightfully and surprisingly familiar; and, with the possible exception of Guizot, there is no recent French writer with whom we feel more quickly and thoroughly at home.

A satisfactory analysis of the qualities which go to produce this effect would occupy space which must be otherwise utilised; but Mr. Saintsbury, in his intelligent and candid, if not very sympathetic, Introduction, gives a quotation and makes a comment which are significant enough to deserve a passing reference. The quotation is from M. Edouard Rod, who wrote of Scherer :

" Il ne jugeait pas les écrits avec son intelligence ; il les jugeait avec son caractère " ; and Mr. Saintsbury adds the remark :

" I am not at all fond of critical fireworks, but this is not a firework, it is a lamp. Intelligence adapts itself, character does not ; intelligence is charitable ; character is apt to be a little Pharisaic ; intelligence has no prejudice, character has much."

Both the mot of M. Rod and the gloss of Mr. Saintsbury sound—and are intended to sound—very uncomplimentary, nor need it be denied that in its present form M. Rod's criticism is an indictment : not a very serious one it may be, but still an indictment. Modify it, however, very slightly by the addition of one word and the alteration of another, and let it be said of Scherer that he judged literature not merely with his intelligence, but with his personality, and the indictment becomes at the same time a word of truth, a word of praise, and a nearly complete explanation of the Englishness, to use an awkward word, of the essays in this volume. For the best English criticism has never been either the mere criticism of character, which tends to be purely didactic, or the criticism of intelligence, which tends to be purely aesthetic, but the criticism of personality, which endeavours to take account of every element of human interest which it finds in literature—to recognise the force of the appeal which literature makes to the moral, the intellectual, and the emotional sensibilities.

This volume, which will win for its translator and editor the hearty gratitude of every lover of letters, consists of twelve essays. Three of them deal with George Eliot (Silas Marner, Daniel Deronda, and the biography by Mr. Cross), two with Shakspeare, the remaining seven being devoted to John Stuart Mill (Representative Government), Taine's History of English Literature, Milton, Sterne, Wordsworth, Carlyle, and Lord Beaconsfield's Endymion. The papers first named will be read with special ardour by those "thoughtful" people—the sarcastic quotation marks are Mr. Saintsbury's—who still holds to that "extravagant estimate" of the genius of George Eliot ; the decease of which has been somewhat prematurely announced. Certain idiosyncrasies of temperament make Mr. Saintsbury indifferent or hostile to some of the most characteristic features of George Eliot's work ; and he seems anxious to persuade himself and his readers that in the two later papers M. Scherer retracted or modified "the rather effusive and uncritical laudation" of the essay on Silas Marner and its predecessors. It is not easy to find the penitential passages, for Mr. Saintsbury can hardly be thinking of such trivialities of comparative disparagement as the reference to the undue didacticism of Romola and the more elaborate assault upon the Jewish portion of Daniel Deronda ; but, whatever may be their weight and purport, the poor "thoughtful" reader has no reason to complain of anything like unsympathetic tepidity. After celebrating George Eliot's invention, as manifested in incident and situation, her winning felicity of description, her absolute mastery of varied dialogue, M. Scherer exclaims :

" It is not too much to say that there is something Shaksperian in this. And yet we have not come to the end of the qualities which make our author the first of contemporary novelists, for it is in creating her characters that she especially shows her genius. There is not one of her works which has not bestowed upon the literature of her country some of those figures which, once seen, abide in the memory of men, more real, more living than the actual heroes of history. . . . Do we not perceive throughout the glance which divines all motives, which lays bare all feelings, and which would be more pitiless than remorse itself if the author's penetration were not equalled by her tenderness for human weakness and human suffering ? George Eliot has created a kind in which she will have no successor, because we shall never again see the qualities of the thinker so combined with those of the artist. . . . Story, description, reflection, dialogue—all in her writings is auxiliary to the painting of the secret movements of the mind ; while the minuteness of her observation never hurts either the vigorous realism of her writing, the personality of her creations, or the passionate interest of her drama."

Of course there is little or nothing in the substance of this criticism which is absolutely fresh. Some of us who make no claim to anything but the devotion of sincere conviction—though we do not resent the formidable epithet "thoughtful"—said something of this kind, albeit with less force and finish, many years ago. The important fact is that it is said here by one who speaks with the peculiar authority of a critical outsider, freed by his position from the prepossessions by which the countrymen of George Eliot are inevitably beset, and yet able to assume their attitude—to see as they see, to feel as they feel.

Mr. Saintsbury hints that M. Scherer's over-valuation of George Eliot—or what he considers such—was due to the fact that her mental history had so much in common with that of her critic ; and on another page of the Introduction we are told that Scherer was "too lenient to Milton's character, which seems to have had a great many points of contact with his own." Were it possible to sustain the accusation implied in these remarks, the critical value of M. Scherer's work would be seriously depreciated, for in that case M. Rod would be entirely right in describing it as the criticism of character pure and simple. But as a matter of fact, M. Scherer's treatment of Milton the man, though devoid of anything like rancour, is also devoid of anything which approaches a sympathetic touch ; and the essays on Sterne and Wordsworth suffice to prove his quick sensitiveness to the intellectual and literary virtue of work which can have made only a partial appeal, or no appeal at all, to fixed idiosyncrasies of character and temperament. Mr. Saintsbury finds M. Scherer too uniformly serious : he cannot "conjugate the verb despère," or feel even in a metaphorical sense "the delights of hearing the chimes at midnight ;" and it is certain that no critic who allowed a native seriousness of temper to restrain the free play of intelligence could have produced an estimate of Sterne so rich in appreciation of all his most characteristic excellencies as is the essay which occupies certain pleasant pages of this volume. Sterne's literary sins, which are as obvious as his personal sins, are indeed treated with just and necessary severity, but the severity is all the more effective for being rigidly discriminating. To Thackeray, who ought better to have understood a fellow humorist, Sterne was a literary charlatan through and through, whose vices were simple vices and nothing more : to M. Scherer these same vices are not one whit less detestable, but they are much more intelligible because they are the effects of valuable and delightful qualities. His contortions, his affectation, his deliberate triviality, his downright impertinences are the self-conscious exaggerations of a humour which must exploit itself fitly or unfitly, in or out of season. Still the true faculty, which does not depend for its effect on this kind of strain, is really there ; and in three or four pages devoted to the nature of humour and of the humorist, M. Scherer gives us not only an extremely interesting analysis, but a singularly faithful portrait of a writer who was of this elusive quality all compact. The passage is far too long to quote ; and though it deals only with the manifestation of humour in creative work and is so far incomplete, it is one of the most valuable contributions to a fascinatingly difficult problem of definition.

The essay on Endymion is merely a very able and just review of a book which, but for the fact of its authorship, would long ago have been forgotten ; but this is the only paper in the volume which suffers from the lack of a theme of enduring interest. The article on "Shakspeare and Criticism" fully justifies Mr. Saintsbury's description of it as "one of the best examples of M. Scherer's critical grasp" ; and the essays on Mill, Taine, and Carlyle, exhibit in various ways most of the intellectual and literary qualities which make the author's work at once so illuminating and so attractive. The essay on Milton is undoubtedly a masterly performance ; but those who recall Matthew Arnold's emphatic eulogy may find it in some respects disappointing, and may be inclined to regard the eulogist's own criticism as a more satisfying statement of the true nature of Milton's supremacy. For readers of the pages devoted to "Wordsworth and Modern Poetry" no such disappointment is in store. What has already been said of another estimate is doubtless also true of this masterpiece of sympathetic interpretation—that much of its substance consists of thought which is fairly familiar ; though even in dealing with such a well-worn theme as the attitude of Wordsworth to Nature, M. Scherer's clear individual insight gives to his work a quality of arresting freshness. Curiously enough, it is in this essay that we find the one solitary example of national limitation. M. Scherer was convinced that the essential difference between certain poems of Wordsworth's which are effective and popular, and certain other poems which are comparatively ineffective and unpopular, lies in the fact that the former are written in rhymed and the latter in blank verse. After a naïf eulogy of rhyme, based on the consideration that "it is the conquered difficulty which produces the impression of surprise, and it is surprise which produces interest" (in which case it may be said that the Ingoldby Legends with their rhyming tour de force must be the most interesting of poetical compositions), M. Scherer proceeds:

"Blank verse, which is, when rightly considered, only cadenced prose—which lacks what I should call the dramatic interest of the poet's struggle with rhyme—needs to be relieved by the greatest intensity of thought and expression. The creative power of the author must reinforce the poverty of the instrument he uses. This is the case, for instance, with Milton, whose imagination triumphs so victoriously both over the ungrateful character of his subject and over the monotony inherent in the versification he has chosen."

Gravely to argue out this matter in the columns of an English literary journal—to set oneself to prove that blank verse is something very different from cadenced prose; that there may be an interesting "struggle" with great metrical harmonies as well as with rhyming syllables; that Milton's verse, so far from being monotonous, has a wealth of variety which only a great master can achieve with the instrument of rhyme—would be to perform an almost ludicrously supererogatory task. It is clear that M. Scherer might have made his own the startling confession of Charles Lamb, "I have no ear." But an ear, though it certainly counts for much in the appreciation, say, of Lord Tennyson's "Tithonus," is not everything; and in the present volume not one of the really essential endowments of the great critic is found wanting.

Mahdism and the Egyptian Sudan. By Major F. R. Wingate. (Macmillans.)

ALTHOUGH the majority of people in this country seem always to take a certain interest in matters connected with Egypt, it is to be regretted that Major Wingate could not have managed to bring out the present work somewhat earlier. From a popular point of view, it appears too late to receive that attention which its merits so well deserve. But to a limited number of Englishmen, whom interest or duty compel to study the development of affairs in Egypt, both past and present, this book will prove of considerable value; for it gives a masterly analysis of the characters of the inhabitants of Egypt, and also of the Sudan.

Major Wingate has proved that he is a shrewd observer of men and events; and, in addition to his thorough knowledge of the language of the country, his official position makes his work an authority. He has successfully carried out his task of giving a detailed history of the rise and fall of Mahdism, and he has further enhanced the value of his book by bringing his account of events well down to the present time. It is an interesting history; and if we are to believe some recent writers, it is not wholly impossible that we may soon see a repetition of those events in the Sudan which, but a little time ago, attracted the attention even of the apathetic throughout Europe. Hence, it is desirable that the public at large should be made acquainted with the true characters of the Sudan rebellion—particularly when the fire of the insurrection among the Arabs of Yemen is still smouldering. It is, therefore, to be hoped that Major Wingate may see his way to produce a more readable abridgment of his work. The present volume is somewhat heavy, and may be called too "blue-bookish" to appeal to the popular taste.

This, of course, from a political and general point of view. To scholars, students of history, ethnology, and antiquities, the volume before us abounds with interest. In particular, it contains a number of Arabic letters (as a rule accurately and literally rendered into English) by the late Mahdi and his followers, which throw light on some intricate points in Semitic philology. These documents undoubtedly prove that the Arabic language still retains its pristine vigour to an extent which might seem incredible to those who have been misled by some would-be scholars. As a matter of fact, so far as the written language is concerned, no change has taken place since the time of Muhammad, except in ideas and in a modified style, which is an improvement rather than otherwise.

The numerous maps are not the least admirable feature of the book. We have also a detailed description of the Sudan coinage in both gold and silver. Finally, the index, an indispensable addition to a work of this kind, enables a reader who may not feel disposed to wade through the entire volume to find out at once whatever particularly concerns himself.

Some few years ago, when the Mahdi's power was at its height, Prof. Robertson Smith read a paper at the Royal Institution on Mahdism, its history and character. It was an opportune and valuable paper, a careful study of which would throw light upon the rapidity with which such movements are wont to spread amongst Mohammedans. The word "Mahdi" is the noun patient or passive participle of the Arabic root hada, "to guide, enlighten," therefore Mahdi means "the guided or enlightened," guided by divine providence—hence, able to guide others along the paths of knowledge and duty. There can be no doubt whatever—and Major Wingate's book goes far to prove the fact—that the late Mahdi at first believed himself inspired and called upon to fulfil a divine mission, though he may have taken advantage of temporal power to attain certain personal ends—legitimate from his own point of view.

Major Wingate shows how the condition of affairs at the time was ripe for the appearance of a Mahdi. Misrule, venality, and oppression, on the part of many of the Egyptian officials in the Sudan, had prepared the ground for him. He was a man of strong individuality and a fertile imagination, by means of which he induced his countrymen to believe that he possessed the divine sanction required by tradition. He also adopted, like Muhammad, the same effective policy of absolute equality. Apart from his religious disquisitions, his orders on modesty of dress, abstinence, food, and morality, are highly instructive. The following extract will go far to explain both his own character and that of his followers

"From Mohammed El Mahdi to all his Followers.

In the name of God, etc.—This world, my brethren, is the world of unbelievers and the prison of the believers. The world to come is the world of the believers. Quit, therefore, the pleasures of this world, and let the unbelievers enjoy them.

My orders are that ye—

1. Abstain from wine; neither sell it nor drink it, whether in the bazaars or in your houses, but rather cleanse yourselves from it, and let it not be seen in your dwellings.

2. That ye order your wives and children to say daily the "Five Prayers," and to see that this duty is strictly carried out.

3. That ye abstain from theft and adultery and punish all those who commit such acts.

4. That ye hold daily prayers at home, and also in time of travelling.

5. That ye be faithful and honest, never concealing the booty taken in war.

6. That ye oblige your wives and children to cover their heads and bodies, and if you see any woman with uncovered head you should punish her.

7. That ye do not permit women to mourn over the dead, or to follow them to the tomb.

8. That ye see that the dowry of a woman about to be married is not great. In the case of a virgin, ten dollars is sufficient; and in the case of a widow, five.

9. That ye do not permit your wives and daughters to graze cattle in company with men and strangers, and that ye prevent all immorality among them.

10. That if ye see a slave or an animal going astray ye do not conceal it, but rather try to find its owner; and if ye cannot find its owner, then take it to the Beit el Mal.

Be faithful and obedient in carrying out these orders, which are the orders of God and his Mahdi, otherwise you will be destroyed."

On the whole, Major Wingate's book merits the highest praise. There are, however, a few inaccuracies, from which so large a work can never be entirely free. So long as our author keeps to the record of facts, he interests and fascinates the reader; but when he diverges into speculative arguments, he becomes less convincing. He says, for instance, "Islam itself was hardly [sic] believed in for nearly 200 years after the Prophet's death." As a matter of fact this very belief in Islam was the main factor in giving the early Arabs, immediately after the Prophet's death, such remarkable victories. Again, he says, "The Egyptian is incapable of abstract reasoning. . . ." A general is once said to have given thirteen reasons for not bringing up his guns, the first being that he had no guns. Our author may have thirteen reasons for not attempting to prove this assertion, but so far he has not brought forward the first.

H. ANTHONY SALMONÉ.

Angling Sketches. By Andrew Lang (Longmans.)

THAT Mr. Lang, after his pleasant studies in folk-lore, ballad, and fairy-tale, should contribute to literature a few bright essays on angling was a foregone conclusion to all who knew his enthusiasm for the fly-rod. And yet to write on angling is a perilous enterprise. The fanatic, indeed, reads everything that touches his favourite sport, even the crudest of essays. A glance at the papers devoted to fishing shows that dozens of such productions are written every week. But for an angling sketch to satisfy the critic and obtain the right to pass into the enchanted realm of English literature, it must contain sound sense and humour; and, if possible, an additional topic should lend a pleasing flavour of novelty to the angling matter proper. Walton, the inventor of the angling essay, diversified his ever charming chapters with episodes on otter-hunting, hawking, birds, gipsies, beggars, and what not. Even cookery is glorified under his artistic touch. It suffices to name Wilson, St. John, and A. E. Knox, to show that Mr. Lang has powerful competitors in angling literature. The two latter interweave their anecdotes of fly-fishing with natural history observations; while quidquid agunt homines—courtship, marriage, death, form the staple of Christopher North's hilarity, as rod in hand he wanders by the Tweed. Besides the archaeological interests attaching to old Border castles and ballads, Mr. Lang fastens upon strange and exciting stories of ghostly visitants, and takes his readers to another border-land beyond the horizon of the present life, whence psychological fancies can be summoned, and where man is not bounded by the prosaic conditions of identity, space, and time. This device, indeed, is not new in angling literature; but it has been given to few writers to draw such a curtain of vraisemblance over their spiritual creations as does Mr. Lang. The reader advances spell-bound, as the author would have him, by mist-veiled burn and darkling correi, and finds himself enveloped in the mysterious atmosphere of the further-world, which is so congenial to Celtic superstition. Perhaps the clue to the mystery is given him; more likely it is not; and, if at all sympathetic, he probably lays down the exciting volume to enter his name at once as a member of the Society for Psychical Research. No greater compliment can be paid to Mr. Lang's workmanship.

It will be seen that these essays address themselves to a much wider circle than merely those blessed with piscatorial tastes. All lovers of the "silver Tweed," and the enchanted land of song and story through which it flows; of the Yarrow and St. Mary's Loch; of Loch Awe, reputed home of salmo ferox (seldom found, however, at home); of Ashestiel and the Magician whose memory will never leave it; of Loch Leven in its softer aspects, when no angling competition vulgarises the pleasant ripple of its "glaucous" waves, as Mr. Lang well terms them; above all, those who admire incisive "canny" humour and transparent English idiom—all will be pleased with these angling sketches. They are perfectly natural, never overstrained, with the pink of the heather and the blue of the mountain stream colouring every page. It is a small thing, but a satisfaction to every lover of the language, to observe that Mr. Lang never "rises" a fish, as do the generality of literary anglers, but always "raises" it. As for solecisms and slang, Mr. Lang will away with none of them. The volume may be termed in a double sense a book of sketches, for it is daintily illustrated by Mr. Burn Murdoch. His three etchings and other numerous woodcuts add a great charm to the essays. Who has not fished in the Tweed? These engravings of Ashestiel and other well-known fishing pools will recall many a delightful day to old anglers.

Turning to the essays themselves, several of which have been already published in magazines, but have been revised and to some extent re-written. The amusing "Confessions of a Duffer" lead to reminiscences of "A Border Boyhood." Happy, indeed, is the boy brought up in this land of romance! "Loch Fishing" is one of the most sensible contributions to that style of fishing yet published. The author says truly that, though unscientific, it is a pleasant amusement. Loch trout, as a rule, rise at any kind of fly, and any one may catch them if—a very wide if—they happen to be in the humour for taking fly at all. "The Black Officer" and "The Double Alibi" are excellent morsels of folk-lore. In "The Lady or the Salmon," there is a reminiscence of an old angling tale which relates how a chaplain of the Bishop of London lost a wife by his devotion to the sport of gudgeon-fishing. Not merely does the author teach his readers how to catch salmon and trout—and many of his hints are well worth remembering—but every old house or castle, every stream or prospect in the Borders, reminds him of legend and song. Enough has been said to direct all admirers of Scotch scenery to a little book which must be pronounced charming. Carefully written, prettily bound, and plentifully illustrated, every possessor of these "Sketches" will prize them, and long that the amusing author may soon delight him with a second series.

M. G. WATKINS.

Sir James A. Picton: a Biography. By his son, J. Allanson Picton. (Isbister.)

THE subject of the present memoir was a noteworthy example of a man who, by his own strength of character, not only attained an honourable position for himself, but also achieved just distinction as a public man and a useful citizen. The saying of John Wesley, "The world is my parish," is often quoted: Sir James Picton might have said with perfect truth, "My parish is the world." His interest centred in his native town. He worked earnestly for her advancement, and his ambition was for local honours. If this betokens a certain limitation of character, it betokens, quite as much, entireness within its limits. The more glittering prizes which must be sought outside, attract many persons who in character and in devotion have nothing like so high a claim to our esteem as Sir James Picton. The local parliaments are, after all, the basis of government, whether good or bad; and the salvation of the country depends more on excellence there than on excellence in the imperial parliament.

Accordingly, although the present story will be read with particular interest by

Liverpool men and women, it should prove both interesting and instructive to a wider circle. Sir James Picton began life poor. His father seems to have been a man always beset with misfortune. The son, happily, did not inherit his thriftless qualities. He possessed the characteristics usually to be found in men who, placed in such circumstances as he was, ultimately command success. He was persevering and industrious; he had an eye to the main chance, and a faculty for gathering information and applying it usefully. Success such as his is due as much to thriftiness with knowledge as to thriftiness with money. Small as were his school advantages, he became a man of considerable accomplishments. He was something of a linguist, a philologist, and an antiquary. He had ideas of his own on art, and indeed there were few subjects upon which he could not discourse at least intelligently. He may not have been really profound in any one branch. His Memorials of Liverpool, for instance—his chief work—is instructive but not profound. But he had what may be termed good working knowledge for practical purposes. He was a useful, well-informed public man, rather than a scholar. Had he been a scholar, his native town would not have appreciated him so much. As it was, he was excluded from some public offices, notably the mayoralty, to which he was fully entitled. Party greed for the "spoils of office" stood in the way. But in other directions his services were duly recognised. Between the Museum, which was named after Sir William Brown because he gave £20,000 for it; and the Walker Art Gallery, which cost the donor twice that sum, stands the Picton Reading Room, so named because Sir James Picton gave time and energy, not money, in the cause of public libraries. This is as it should be: a fitting recognition of great public service. In Sir James Picton we have the highest type of man that Liverpool cares to honour. As everyone knows, Liverpool loves a lord; it also honours success in business; occasionally it recognises meritorious citizenship. But in its William Roscoe, or its Arthur Hugh Clough, or even its Mrs. Hemans, or, indeed, in its men of thought and of letters at all, it takes no pride. There are many such, dead and living, not without honour, save in their native city.

Two or three letters from Mr. Ruskin are printed here. There are also some reminiscences of Mr. Gladstone, with whom Sir James Picton came in contact on several occasions. The story how Mr. Gladstone, when he was a child, asked a carpenter who was working at his father's house, "Do you love Jesus?" is not particularly edifying. It is more suggestive of a little prig than of a coming statesman. He reappears to better advantage on the hustings at the election for South Lancashire, and, again, in friendly discussion with Sir James Picton on other topics. Mr. Gladstone's brother, the eccentric but admirable Robertson Gladstone, is also alluded to, but he was not a favourite with Sir James Picton. That notable experiment of his, the granting of licences for public houses without restriction and the publication of the names of offenders in the newspaper, did not gain Sir James Picton's approval. It was tried for too short a time to test its efficiency; after which the so-called temperance party regained the ascendancy, and, through its influence, the publican became a favoured monopolist, as he had been before.

The difficult task of writing a father's biography has been performed with skill and discretion by Mr. Allanson Picton. The chief defect of the book is the want of an index, which every biography should possess; and a portrait of Mrs. Picton, who helped her husband so much in his career, would have been acceptable. Mr. Allanson Picton is not often sarcastic, but we must presume he means to be so when he likens the late Sir William Brown to one of the Brothers Cheeryble. For the rest, his style is studiously moderate.

Father Stafford. By Anthony Hope. (Cassells.)

Dally. By Maria Louise Pool. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

European Relations. By Talmage Dalin. (Fisher Unwin.)

MR. CLARK RUSSELL'S strength and weakness as a novelist are almost equally displayed in his latest romance of the sea. There is no living writer who can describe with like freshness and vigour and power the ever-varying aspects of sky and ocean; and not only in his set descriptions and in his seaman-talk, but throughout his story, on every page, there is the smell of the brine. But in all his novels there is one heroine only. She is variously named: the tragic or picturesque circumstances differ; the inevitable haven is reached through more or less romantic vicissitudes; but, dark or fair, tall or petite, the lady is always the same. Mr. Russell seems to have conceived two stock characters, suitable for all occasions; and this man and this woman are now so familiar, that the reader of My Danish Sweetheart knows beforehand not only the central motive of the plot but also much of the conversation which is bound to ensue. It might be hypercriticism to suggest that there is too much fundamental resemblance even in Mr. Clark Russell's plots, yet it may be said that episodic variety is not enough to distinguish one book from another. But vigorous movement, dramatic incidents, telling episodes, with a style at once forceful and delicate, are to be welcomed with gratitude at a time when how not to tell a story interestingly seems the first aim of certain novelists. My Danish Sweetheart is in no way inferior to its predecessors, though occasionally the author has indulged in descriptive epithets and phrases which weaken rather than enhance the vigorous freshness of his vocabulary. "Cataractal," for instance, is an ugly word, even if justifiable. The hero of the story, Hugh Tregarthen, is a fine young fellow, who deserves his good fortune in sharing many strange and stirring adventures with Helga Nielsen, and in ultimately winning that courageous Danish lass for his wife. The reader will much enjoy some of the side-episodes; and, as usual, Mr. Clark Russell has delineated several types of the British seaman, which, if not always flattering to the originals, have the advantage of absolute fidelity to life. After the loss of the Danish barque, and the death of the captain Nielsen, Hugh and Helga are taken from their raft by the three-man crew of a Deal lugger. These three men, Abraham and Jacob and Thomas, are vivid studies of the longshore sailor; and, at once in their ignorance, assurance, and manly pluck and worth, are "Deal luggermen all over." Wild as the enterprise naturally seems to Hugh and Helga, the men are "a-carrying" the lugger to Australia "on a job for the gent that's bought her." Abraham, in particular, is one of Mr. Clark Russell's longshore types that will live. He has a warm heart, and is not without a certain rude imagination; but all he has to say after the tragic death of one of his comrades is that "nuthin' ever made me feel so ornary as the drowning of pore Thomas." Yet here as elsewhere he is true to his kind. The lugger does not get far on her voyage, and Hugh and Helga are again rescued, this time by an apparently not wholly despicable, but most disagreeable, skipper, named Captain Joppa Bunting. He is probably drawn from the life, despite his unseamanlike ways, as, certainly, is his shiftless, homeless mate, Jones. Thenceforth the plot evolves rapidly and excitingly, and Captain Joppa Bunting's Malay crew prove that to play with fire is apt to be a painful as well as a dangerous experiment. The romance will be deservedly popular; and if in certain respects Mr. Clark Russell holds too much to his conventions, he at least never fails to delight and invigorate, like one of his well-loved salt sea-breezes.

There is, as might be expected from the author of Fettered for Life and Between Life and Death, no lack of dramatic incident in Mr. Frank Barrett's new story. It is a romance of crime, but on picturesque and to a great extent fresh lines. Olga Zassoulich is no doubt a sinner, but, at first at any rate, she is more sinned against than guilty of wrong doing. Her father, Ivan Isaakoff (alias Zassoulich) is an accomplished scoundrel of the type long ago depicted by Wilkie Collins; for though the picturesque aristocratic Prince Zassoulich is distinct in appearance, manner, and method from the inimitable Count Fosco, they are really closely akin. The Count was suave and cruel (when required): Ivan Isaakoff is dignified, and at heart a savage; but both would be charming in society, and exceedingly unpleasant acquaintances if hostile. Prince Zassoulich and his daughter Olga are pretenders, who, after a daring and so far successful career in London, unavoidably find themselves forced to that unpleasant meal of Dead-Sea Fruit which we all of us consume soon or late in some degree, homeopathically or otherwise. The plot is conceived and wrought with skill impossible not to follow with keen interest through the perilous vicissitudes of the Olga till her marriage with Leslie, and, thereafter, of the slow but certain ruin of her unsubstantial palace. The latter portion of the novel is characterised by great pathos as well as by a certain but Mr. Barrett might well have been content with some of the brutalities of the couple, James and Jane Parker. That such things as are described in a certain chapter in the third volume are impossible in London, or even in the country, but—well, after all we do not live in a golden age, and have not the Celestial's callous indifference to the savagery of torture.

Mr. Frank Stockton's difficulty was not to live up to The Lady or the Thief, but, on one hand, to Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. A. on the other. The penalty of the former is that he is never allowed to be serious. This, is no doubt, is the reason why one or two of Mr. Stockton's recent essential fiction have not been so warmly appreciated as their predecessors. Yet there is a delicacy, as delicate, if not so obvious, and as true to life, in Mr. Stockton's recent productions in any of his earlier books; and it is no less attractive from its subdued tone. The Squirrel Inn has, perhaps, the fault of being a few chapters too long; but it is a delightful story of its kind, with as quaint characteristics as the inn itself, a product of that most original of Bostonians, Stephen Petter, whose gauge of the world of would-be visitors is the extent of the acquaintanceship with a certain family whose members embody for him all possibilities of excellence—"the Rockmores of German town." From the time when Walter had steps on board the steamboat Manana, and unexpectedly finds himself bound (apparently for ever) with the care of a baby, till his arrival with its mother, a charming young widow, at the Squirrel Inn, we have the author of Rudder Grange and The Casting Away constantly in view. Thereafter, if there is not so much humorous byplay, there are extremely clever studies of character. The unconventional (and from a man's point of view, too delightful) lady-nurse, Ida Mayberry; the eccentric scholar-recluse, Mr. Tipplegray; that strange crank, Stephen Petter; and his good homely wife; the somewhat shrewish, eminently New England, but no means unattractive Calthea Rose; and that Bohemian of Bohemians, Lang Beam, are one and all new and entertaining acquaintances. Simple as the plot of the story is, there are probably few readers who will foresee the final developments, what must have been for nearly all concerned a singularly pleasant sojourn at the Squirrel Inn.

In common with the latest novel of the older and more widely-known author, Mr. Anthony Hope's new book is, broadly speaking, an analysis of the religious sentiment. Both in conception and treatment, however, there is a marked difference. Father Stafford from Blanche, Lady Palam, in the latter there is a delicacy of style which is never revealed in the former, Mr. Hos the more robust both in thought and expression. The logical drawback to Stafford is a lack of justification for certain incidents, but in the main it is a carefully thought-out and well-written story. The reader may or may not find the whole narration of Father Stafford's love and disappointment, and ultimate conversion to the Church of Rome, an enthralling one, and there is certainly room for complaint on the score of mental processes left undescribed or but vaguely indicated; but there is, throughout, that saving breath of truth to life which is so potent a redeeming grace in fiction. No doubt most readers will agree with Sir Roderick Ayre when, at the end of the story, he says to the woman whom Stafford vainly loved: "I think, Lady Claudia, you have spoilt a saint and made a cardinal."

Dally is, presumably, the first work of a young writer. Miss Pool's talent is akin to that of her distinguished countrywoman, Miss Wilkins, in its defects as well as in its high qualities. Dally is an untutored child, snatched as it were from natural savagery; and the story of her eccentric sayings and doings, of her development, and her environment, is told with insight and skill. Winslow, the nominal hero, is a mere shadow; but Dally herself, Mrs. Abijah Jacobs, better known as the "Widder Bijah," and the rest, are admirably drawn. No wonder Dally caused much consternation when, almost on her first appearance at the widow's, she remarked, with naive nonchalance, "Please, I'll have just er sup at some whiskey now. Don't go ter weaken' it naaw." The author has clearly "found herself" at the start. If she make the advance that may now be expected, she ought to win a high place among the American novelists of the day.

The latest edition to the Pseudonym Library is rightly sub-titled "A Tirolese Sketch," for European Relations seems to have been written more as a record of a sojourn among the Austrian Alps than as a romance proper. It is to be feared that those who have not visited Tyrol, or have not the hope or intention of going there, will feel but a languid interest in this pleasantly told, if sedate, story of Natalie Berg and her kith and kin.

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Renascence: a Book of Verse. By Walter Crane. (Elkin Mathews.) Mr. Walter Crane has pleased us so often and so greatly by his charming designs, that we cannot help feeling that it is from some defect upon our part rather than his that we are comparatively insusceptible to the spell of his poems. We admire indeed the purity of their aim and feeling. His Muse is evidently to him in a true sense sacred. He allows nothing common or unclean to come near her. He will invoke her in no meaner cause than Love or Liberty. He will clothe her in the most precious and beautiful raiment he can devise. He will hymn her with the fairest words he can summon. And yet our knees are stubborn and our ears uncharmed. It has not been without a struggle that we have come to the unpleasant conclusion that we are not rightly constituted to catch the finer rapture which, doubtless, for some more happy souls strikes from the numbers of Mr. Walter Crane. Perhaps we have not been called, certainly we have not been chosen. Yet we are not altogether without hope. Although, at least for the present, we have given up "The Sirens Three," and all the longer poems as beyond us, we flatter ourselves that we are near to understanding, if not to admiring, some, of the shorter pieces. The shorter they are the more near of appreciation do we feel; and this is encouraging in a way, for it favours the notion that if we had only begun our study with the easier pieces we might before this have mounted by degrees to the most difficult. At all events we feel that this course may be safely recommended to the ordinary reader. Let him, say, begin with the "Triolet," on page 148:

In the light, in the shade,
This is Time and Life's measure;
With a heart unafraid,
In the light, in the shade,
Hope is born and not made,
And the heart finds its treasure.
In the light, in the shade—
This is Time and Life's measure.

We should then recommend him to hover lightly over the Rondeaux, Rondels, and Sonnets, settling on this:

RONDEL.

When Time, upon the wing,
A swallow heedless flies,
Love birds forget to sing
Beneath the lucent skies;
For now belated spring
With her last blossom hies,
When time, upon the wing,
A swallow heedless flies.
What Summer hope shall bring
To wistful dreaming eyes?
What fateful forecast fling
Before Life's last surprise
When Time, upon the wing,
A swallow heedless flies?

and on this:

TO M. F. C.

This sheaf that I have bound, of mingled grain,
Beneath the noon to give a spot of shade,
Where might we sit and mark, before they fade,
The fleeting lights across life's dappled plain;
Ere with its treasured load Time's rolling wain
Piled up with memories, and thoughts unsaid,
With hopes and fears in trembling leaf and blade—
Turns sunward, where the harvest-home is made.
Perchance the tangled stems some flowers unfold,
Not all unmeet the brows of her to wreath,
Who with me bore the burthen of the morn.
If yet the scarlet please not, on the corn,
Love's blue is steadfast, and thy name in gold
Is writ by love's wing-feather underneath.

Then, if he feels inclined to further effort, as indeed we should have been if the volume had commenced with these pieces, let him try one of the least difficult of the longer pieces, say, "The City of Love." Then, if he finds his faculties a little strained in following the meaning of the whole, or the construction of the parts, we should advise the taking down of one of the volumes of Mr. William Morris, not as an antidote, but as an alternative.

The Religion of Humanity, and other Poems. By Annie Matheson. (Percival.) The chief poem in this volume is an able vindication of the Christian religion as it is professed and taught by orthodox Christendom. The poem is able both as a literary effort and a theological argument, but theology and poetry do not march well together. While the theologian is propounding his dogmas, the poet catches instinctively at the divine truths of which life is full. He can reach the mark at a sweep of the wing, while the other trudges wearily to it by roundabout roads, and with needless fetters on his feet. This poem itself supplies a good illustration of the fact. When Miss Matheson simply puts into verse the beliefs of the Churches, elaborated to suit the requirements of that form of composition, the reader is conscious of no advantage in having his everyday theology served up to him in this way; but when she strikes out a wholly new line of thought, the effect is pleasantly new also. Here is a passage of this welcome character:

"The God whom they reject
May to high tasks elect
Souls thus attuned; their self-denying dream
To Him may seem
A nobler, worthier creed
Than the unholy greed
Of those ill-fathered Pharisees who take
His awful Human Name
On their smooth lips,
Their smooth, cold lips, and make
In the clear shining of the Morning Star
A little selfish glitter; quick to feed
Their vanity on others' sin and need
And bitter shame,
While on the unthinking crowd, of hope forlorn,
Descends a load too heavy to be borne,
Which they, who cast it on them from afar,
Spurn under foot, nor touch with finger-tips,
Clutching at heaven for themselves, and then
Damning the souls of half their fellow-men."

The argument contained in these lines might perhaps have been stated a little more briefly and clearly, but there is evident in them the largeness of the poet rather than the too common narrowness of the theologian. The last couplet depicts with quite epigrammatic force the whole spirit of Pharisaism. Miss Matheson has true poetic feeling, and a range of sympathy which seems to be fairly wide and deep. The sufferings of the poor, the joys of children, the brightness of nature, the pathos of human experience, are echoed or reflected in her verse. The following sonnet on Browning—written in his lifetime—is an example of her best work:

"London, thou hast thy poet; lift thy head!
Florence may find sweet homage in his lays,
But thou—thou art his home, with thee he stays;
And in his poems loving eyes have read
Thy very self; the multitudinous tread
Of that quick motley throng that crowds thy ways,
Where all the game is tangled, and who plays
For this world only, wins a stone for bread.
Standing on solid earth, with heaven above,
The squalor and splendour of life thy poet sees,
The sordid seeming, and the fact divine,
Grim byways, lacking not their almond trees,
And, in the midmost noise and whirl, a shrine,
A sacred altar to the Lord of Love."

In Cloud and Sunshine. By J. Pierce. (Kegan Paul & Co.) This little volume contains almost as many poems as pages. Mr. Pierce has modestly shunned the temptation, which so often proves too strong for writers of verse, to deal ambitiously with great subjects. He avoids the epic altogether, and only once—to describe a little patch of "Dreamland"—ventures upon blank verse. But there are few subjects which come amiss to him. There is scarcely any phase of nature, or of thought, or of human life, about which he has not something to say, and for the most part he says it well. He succeeds best, however, in the treatment of rustic and other simple subjects, as in these opening verses of "The Country Road":

"It winds away thro' hill and dale,
By cheerful hamlet, park, and wood,
Thro' banks bestarred with primrose pale,
Thro' golden pastures, fair and good;
Past commons bright with flaming broom,
Beside old ivy-mantled towers,
It hies away through brake and bloom
'Mid sunny rays or drifting showers.

"Anon it crosses brawling brook,
O'er rustic bridge, anon it takes
A curve thro' some sequestered nook;
A quiet resting-place it makes
Beside some wayside inn with sign
That creaks within the ancient tree,
Then on it mounts thro' groves of pine,
'Mid solemn roar as of the sea."

When Mr. Pierce becomes abstruse, it is not so easy to follow him. We do not quite know, for instance, how to interpret the following passage, taken from a poem with the inscrutable title, "The Vessel fitted to Destruction":

"Oh, winter hoary;

Pierce with thy keen breath the dead universe,
O'er gloom the frozen skies and clothe the mountains

With whited garments; strike the glassy fountains

"In spires of stiffen'd ice, while forth the hearse
Of the old year to time's sepulture travels.
For ye do shadow forth the accursed doom

"That presses down from cradle to the tomb
Some victim soul whose smitten life unravels
The mighty coils that circumstance and will "Have knit together in some mad convulsion,

Some blame far off, some passion's fierce impulsion, Gathered in ruin irresistible."

Lays of Common Life. By William Toynbee. (Remington.) Mr. Toynbee writes of the seamy side of common life—of the small tragedies and pathetic comedies that enter into the daily round of it, often unobserved by those who have no part in them. It is doubtful whether, as a rule, silence is not best as to most of these things; but if the poet can make what is unlovely in them awaken shame where shame should be felt, or arouse sympathy where sympathy is due, then it is well that he should weave them into his verse. Mr. Toynbee's choice of subjects is wide. We have the courtesan who is "out of it" when her victims tire of her fascinations, and society takes to moralising on her sins; the confiding maiden whose honest trust is betrayed; the Crichton at school whose manhood is ruined by the praises heaped on his youth—and for the rest, poor men's sorrows, rich men's vices, "last straws," "faded letters" answered too late, village secrets, and the ways of the town. There is no attempt at fine writing; but there is an admirable attempt, and generally a very successful one, to enter into the lives and thoughts and express the feelings of the people who are written about. The affection of a tramp—not more sober or exemplary than tramps generally are—for the boy he has lost is well told in these characteristic lines:

"But to cut it short, Captain (there's five good mile still

To the crossways, and then I've got 'Arkaway 'ill),

Tho' I loved a pint then (and still does mortal bad!)

'Twor nowt to my love as grow'd up for that lad.
Ay, to sight 'im again—tho' to talk where's the good?—

I'd take to the ribbon!—yes, so'lp me, I would!

"But there, for my likes lovin' worn't, I s'pose, meant.

I loved my poor gal, and afore long she went.
Passon says it's all right, and 'e jawed kind enough,

But my head ain't no use, sir, for passon's book stuff.

All I know is, I used to jog on then some'ow,
But beer or no beer, it's bad travellin' now!

"For last winter Iorst 'im—I calls it that way,
'Cause I promised 'im t'other I never would say.
'When I'm goin'', says 'e, 'dad, don't yer think as I'm dead,

I shall only be trampin' a bit on a'end,
And you'll soon ketch me up,' says 'e, 'arf with a smile,

'And love me the same as you've done all this while.'"

Dreaming. By Blancor Dash. (Kegan Paul & Co.) This book has a merit which "Blancor Dash's" Tales of a Tennis Party had not. In that work the style was not the writer's own, but was borrowed from the Poet Laureate. Here the style is perhaps original, but there is not much to be said for it. "Blancor Dash" writes—with some facility, we admit—in a jargon made up of what are accounted poetic phrases. We fear that in his use they are mere phrases. Our critical stupidity may be abnormal—in that case "Blancor Dash" will, no doubt, duly flay us in his next volume—but his meaning is often either above or beneath us. In the following instance we are quite willing to believe that we do not rise to the height of it. The poem from which we take the passage seems to have defied the writer's skill to name it, and he calls it simply "Stanzas":

"I, with the passion of youth, the strong, mad impulse of emotion,
Trembling and bound by the might of the queen who rules over the sea,
Swaying the ebbing and flow of the tides of the heart as of ocean,
Blind, gave her guidance o'er me.

"Soft eyes were glistening bright with dew as of starlight still-beaming—

Over the harvest-ripe plain flashed the moon all her argent broad shield,
Earth had no being, the real was the fay-land whence banished is seeming,
Soul's depth to soul's depth revealed.

"Lips murmuring softly, lips parted with poise of the sweet words between them,
Stayed by the ebb of the heart whose emotion is heard as they cease,

Beaming from tender-gazed eyes whose lashes now droop not to screen them,
Thrilling a maiden's calm peace!"

We have made an honest attempt to understand these "stanzas," but with very poor success. The first evidently has reference to the moon, but we unwillingly remember that the moon has something to do with the lunatic, as well as with the lover and the poet, and when the poet tells us that he is "Trembling and bound by the might" of the moon we have our fears for him. He says, too, that he submits himself "blind" to the guidance of this luminous "queen." We suppose the shimmer of moonlight would be helpful even to a blind man, but it would scarcely enable him to discern "soft eyes," and "dew as of starlight" in them. Perhaps we are to understand a spiritual insight—"soul's depth to soul's depth revealed"—though in that case the guidance of the moon was needless, and mere moonshine. In the third stanza there are fresh difficulties to be encountered. As we read the verse, the maiden's lips are beaming from her eyes—and from "tender-gazed" eyes; a peculiar description of the visual organ we are not familiar with. Or if not the lips, it is the heart's emotion that is "heard" beaming from the eyes. The poet might possibly be able to suggest another reading, but it could only add to our bewilderment, which is already great enough. A little practice in plain prose, and the plainer the better, would perhaps give to "Blancor Dash's" style some of the clearness it lacks.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in the press Memoirs of the Verney Family during the Civil War, in two volumes, compiled by the late Frances Parthenope, Lady Verney, with a preface by Mr. S. R. Gardiner. Lady Verney's aim was to give a picture of the family of a country gentleman in the seventeenth century, as related in their own words: of the management of the household and the estate, the food they ate, the clothes they wore, the physic they swallowed; their weddings and their funerals; the education of their children; their journeys, their politics, the bills that they paid or could not pay. The mass of detail in the MSS. is, indeed, overwhelming; but from the time of Charles I. Sir Edmund Verney, the Knight Marshal, becomes the central figure of the family story. He shared the King's fortunes almost from boyhood; he was with him at Madrid, he went to his coronation in Scotland, it was his special business to keep order in the palace and its precincts, and it was his privilege to lend his sovereign large sums of money that he could ill spare. The book tells the story of Sir Edmund Verney, of his wife, Margaret Denton, and of their ten children. The portraits at Claydon of the writers of the various letters, by Vandyke, Cornelius Jansen, and others, have been carefully reproduced to illustrate the story.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will issue immediately an English translation of the sermons written by Dr. Richter, Army Chaplain to the Emperor of Germany, and read by His Majesty before his party and crew during his Northern cruises. They will be published under the title of The Voice of the Lord on the Waters.

MR. CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM is writing a volume on Columbus for "The World's Great Explorers Series," published by Messrs. George Philip & Son. It will appear in the early part of next year, the fourth centenary of the discovery which has immortalised the name of Columbus. The next volume of the series will be Mr. Douglas Freshfield's De Saussure and the Alps, which is in an advanced state of preparation.

Barter's Second Innings: Specially Reported for the — School Eleven, is the title of a new booklet for boys which will be issued next week. No author's name appears, but it is understood to be by Prof. Henry Drummond.

MR. HENRY C. BURDETT, editor of the Hospital, has written a work upon Hospitals and Asylums, to be published by Messrs. J. & A. Churchill. In four large volumes, he will deal with medical institutions throughout the world—their origin, history, construction, management, and legislation; while several hundred plans will be given in a separate portfolio. The first two volumes, treating of asylums, with a bibliography and a special index, will be issued next week, and may be subscribed for independently.

A VOLUME of Essays from "Blackwood," by the late Anne Mozley, the chosen editor of Cardinal Newman's Letters, will be published in a few days by Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons, with a brief memoir by her sister, Miss Fanny Mozley.

MR. HENRY FROWDE will publish next week a handsome gift-book for the Christmas season, entitled The Cloud of Witness: a Daily Sequence of Great Thoughts from Many Minds, following the Christian Seasons. It has been compiled by the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton Gell, as a golden treasury of lofty thoughts and aspirations, systematically culled from ancient and modern writers, religious and secular, of every age and creed. It will also be interesting as an example of the best work of the Oxford University Press, printed in deny-octavo, on India paper, with red initials, borders, and ornaments, and a frontispiece after Mr. Holman Hunt's "Light of the World"—a picture which was painted for a former manager of the Oxford Press.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & COMPANY announce an Anglo-Indian Anthology, from the earliest period to the present day, together with the tunes to which the hunting songs are "appointed to be sung."

MR. W. C. HAZLITT has just completed, for Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., a volume of Tales and Legends which may be considered National either by origin or naturalisation. By reducing the narratives to a uniform prose form, and clothing them in characteristic diction, he has endeavoured to present many favourite stories of our ancestors in a more readable and attractive shape. In all cases he has embodied as far as possible the latest information on each subject; and the version of Robin Hood, it is believed, now presents to the general reader for the first time in its true light the outlines of the career of that famous ballad hero.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with its appearance in Paris, Messrs. Cassell & Co. will publish on December 18 the English translation of M. Bonvalot's Across Tibet.

MR. EDWARD STANFORD will publish next week a book of special interest at the present time. It is entitled Missionaries in China; and the author is Mr. Alexander Michie, of Tientsin.

MR. W. L. COURTNEY'S forthcoming volume of essays to be published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall in January next, will be called Studies at Leisre, and will not bear, as previously announced, the Schopenhauerian title of "Parerga." The volume will include "Kit Marlowe's Death," a dramatic sketch which was performed at the Shaftesbury Theatre on the occasion of the Marlowe Memorial matinee.

THE twenty-fourth part of the Century Dictionary is nearly ready. It takes the rubrics to Z, and completes the advertised scheme of the work.

MR. HENRY POWELL is editing for Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. a new edition of The History of the Buccaneers, by John Esquemeling, "one of the Bucaniers," as he is described on the title-page of the first English edition (1684), on which Mr. Powell's edition is based. The reprint will include the scarce "Fourth Part," which contains the voyage of Captain G. Sharp.

THE sixth section of Mr. Blomfield's History of the Deanery of Bicester, which will contain "Two Fords of the River Cherwell," will be issued shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

A SECOND volume of Bygone Lincolnshire will be issued in a few days by Messrs. A. Brown & Sons, of Hull. Mr. William Andrews is the editor of the work.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SONS have in the press a new edition of a book which created some stir on its first appearance a few years ago—South Sea Bubbles, by the Earl and the Doctor.

THE Rev. Dr. Strauss's book on Religion and Morals, after having been translated into Spanish, is now being translated into Mahratti, in order to be introduced into Jewish schools in India.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN was presented on Tuesday last with some silver plate, subscribed for by eighty-three writers in the Dictionary of National Biography, in order to commemorate their association with him while he was editor. The presentation was made on behalf of the subscribers by Dr. Norman Moore, at whose house (94, Gloucester-place) the ceremony took place. Mr. Stephen, in thanking the subscribers for their gift, expressed the regret which he felt on being forced by the state of his health to resign the editorship of the dictionary; but he hoped, as a contributor, to maintain his connexion with the great undertaking to which he had already devoted much labour and several years of his life.

THE friends of Mr. W. Roberts, editor of the Bookworm, will be glad to learn that he is recovering from a two months' illness, the result of an accident while on a holiday in Spain. A necessary operation has proved successful, but Mr. Roberts will scarcely be able to resume general work for a month or six weeks.

ON Monday and Tuesday of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will sell the third portion of the library of the late Sir Thomas Phillipps. This instalment is of a miscellaneous character. Apart from a few books printed in the fifteenth century, and some Americana, the most notable feature is the series of genealogical books privately printed at the Middle Hill Press, two or three of which have never before come into the market.

MR. FRANCIS EDWARDS, of High-street, Marylebone, has issued a sale catalogue, which is as novel as it is interesting, being practically confined to first editions of English authors of the present century. Some of the prices affixed surprise by their smallness as much as others do by their magnitude. But it is necessary to bear in mind that they are the prices asked—by no means the same thing as the prices given to private sellers.

THE second series of lectures given by the Sunday Lecture Society begins on Sunday, December 6, in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, at 4 p.m., when Mr. Eric S. Bruce will lecture on "Fogs and their Prevention." Lectures will subsequently be given by Prof. J. F. Blake, Prof. Vivian B. Lewes, Prof. Percy Frankland, Dr. Benjamin W. Richardson, Mr. Whitworth Wallis, and Mr. Willmott Dixon.

THE Londoner Journal, a German weekly published in London for the last fourteen years, has recently ceased to appear. The Londoner Zeitung, founded many years ago by the late Dr. G. Kinkel, still exists; but, on the whole, the Germans in England have never patronised any German periodical published in this country. It is quite different in America, where the German press is most influential. The New Yorker Staats Zeitung, for instance, has a very large circulation, we believe; but one of the most interesting and best-conducted weekly journals is the Belletristisches Journal, edited by Dr. Julius Goebel. It is a regular depository of the best fictional and poetical literature of Germany, and its political summary is distinguished by great precision and outspoken frankness. Germany itself cannot boast of a more excellent weekly of the kind.

MR. HENRY FROWDE, on behalf of the Oxford University Press, has issued this week the "Oxford Shakespeare," in two editions, which closely correspond with the two editions of the "Globe Shakespeare," published by Messrs. Macmillan. One, printed on ordinary paper and bound in cloth boards, is sold at the low price of 3s. 6d. The other is on India paper, with gold on the binding and with red under the gilt edges. When contrasted with the India paper edition of the "Globe Shakespeare"—which, by the way, is printed at the Cambridge University Press—we find that the "Oxford Shakespeare" has some advantage in clearness of type and opacity of paper. Though containing nearly 130 more pages, it is neither thicker nor heavier. We do not, however, care for the Gothic lettered headlines, nor for the novel method of numbering the lines. We should add that the editor is Mr. W. J. Craig, of Trinity College, Dublin, whose name is not familiar to us in this connexion. His glossary cannot compare in fulness with the admirable one appended to the "Globe" edition. The general style of the "Globe" also has the merit of familiarity; so that, on the whole, we feel ourselves quite unable to make a final choice between the two.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. CLAUDE G. MONTEFIORE having offered to provide the annual sum of £250 during the life of Mr. Schechter, university lecturer in Talmudic at Cambridge, the general board of studies recommend that Dr. Schechter's post be raised to the rank of a readership, as it was (we believe) in the late Dr. Schiller Szeszessy's time.

MR. F. HAVERFIELD, of Lancing College—who recently obtained the Conington prize for the second time of its award—has accepted an invitation to return to Oxford as lecturer at Christ Church. Dr. C. H. Lloyd has also been appointed a lecturer at the same college.

PROF. H. MARSHALL WARD, of Cooper's Hill College, has been approved by the general board of studies at Cambridge for the degree of Doctor in Science.

ON the report of the special board for classics at Cambridge, a grant of £100 from the Worts Travelling Scholars Fund has been made to Prof. J. H. Middleton, towards defraying the expenses of his researches in architecture and the allied decorative arts in Greece, on the condition that he report in a form which may afterwards be published to the University.

IN memory of the late Dr. Luard, the Cambridge Antiquarian Society have offered to publish the early Grace Books of the University, under the editorship of Mr. J. Willis Clark. Dr. Luard's successor in the office of registry.

TWO public lectures were to be delivered at Oxford towards the end of the present week: on Thursday, by Dr. Grueber, reader in Roman law, upon "The Study of Roman Law on the Continent and in England"; and on Friday, by Mr. Morfill, reader in Slavonic, upon "Alexander Pushkin."

AT a meeting of the Society of Historical Theology, held at Oxford on November 19, under the presidency of Prof. Cheyne, it was announced that the Bishop of Durham, the Dean of Westminster, the Rev. Dr. Martineau, and Count Goblet d'Alviella had accepted the invitation to become honorary members of the Society. The Rev. C. B. Upton read a paper entitled, "Some Theological Aspects of the Teaching of the late Prof. T. H. Green." The analytic edition of the Hexateuch, which is being prepared by a committee of the society, has advanced as far as Exodus xxiv.

THE Oxford Magazine draws attention to the results of the recent examination for the Hertford scholarship. The successful candidate himself, and three others out of four mentioned, come from London schools. Again, three out of the five are what is called "close" scholars; both the other two are from St. Paul's.

A REVISED Report has been printed (Williams & Norgate) of the proceedings on laying the foundation stone of Manchester New College at Oxford on October 20. It contains the speeches made on the occasion by Mr. R. D. Darbyshire (secretary), Mr. H. R. Greg (principal), and the Rev. James Drummond (principal). The same publishers have also issued, as a pamphlet, the address delivered that afternoon, to inaugurate the commencement of the session, by the Rev. John Owen, rector of East Anstey, who will be known to many readers of the ACADEMY by his Evenings with the Sceptics. He took for his subject "The Modification of Dogma regarded as a Condition of Modern Progress"; and he traced, with equal learning and boldness, some of the changes that have taken place in the relative importance of religious beliefs since the Renaissance. As a clergyman of the Church of England, he welcomed the establishment in Oxford of a college based upon the principle of "free learning and free teaching in theology."

A COMMITTEE of the Senatus of St. Andrew's University has been formed, with the view of aiding Scottish students in their studies in Paris and other French towns, and of reviving the old friendly feelings which subsisted in the past between academic Scotland and France. The matter has been warmly taken up on the other side of the Channel; and a comité franco-écossais has been organised, with M. Pasteur as president, and including the rector, six deans of faculty, and various professors of the Sorbonne, the Collège de France, the museum, &c., as also M. Francisque Sarcey, M. Larroumet, Director des Beaux-Arts, and other persons of influence in various directions. M. Lavissee, the secretary, has undertaken various good offices towards Scottish students recommended to him by the Scottish Committee. The arrangements were announced, for the first time, last year, but already a considerable number of students have taken advantage of them. An annual "Scots College Dinner" has been started in the French capital. An Hôtel has been engaged for the ensuing year; and it is proposed in the near future to approach the governors of the ancient Scots College in Paris, with the "view of obtaining quarters within at least a portion of the historic building." Similar arrangements to those made in Paris have been inaugurated in the University of Montpellier, under the direction of Prof. Flauhault, Director of the Institute of Botany; and it is proposed to found there a residential hall, to serve as a Collège des Écossais. A similar movement is also on foot at Lyons. Much of the credit for originating and organising the whole scheme is due to Prof. Patrick Geddes, of Dundee, already well known in Edinburgh in connexion with various successful undertakings that have for their end the promotion of the social side of university life in Scotland.

MR. TALFOURD ELY, professor of Greek at Bedford College, London, will deliver a public lecture on "Delphi" (with illustrations), on Monday, December 14, at 4.15 p.m.

TRANSLATION.

LINES WRITTEN BY THE BURMESE PRINCE, NANDA SURIYA, BROTHER OF KING NARAPATI TSITHU, OF PUGAN, WHEN IN PRISON UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH, A.D. 1167.

Yes, he is one who, wealth attained,
Shall pass away and disappear.
'Tis Nature's Law.

Within his golden palace hall,
Surrounded by his lords in state,
He sits serene.

But kings' delights, like eddies small
On ocean's face a moment seen,
Are but for life.

Should he show pity, and not slay,
But set me free, my liberty
Is Karma's work.

Of mortals here the elements
Last not, but change and fall away,
It is the Law.

The sure result of suppliant acts,
Or prayers, I wish not to transfer
To future lives:

'T escape this fate, past sins render,
Is my desire, calmly I'll wait,
My heart is firm.

Thee, gentle lord, I blameless hold,
Freely to thee I pardon give,
'Tis not thy deed.

Danger and death are constant foes,
And in this world must ever be;
It is the Law.

R. F. ST. ANDREW ST. JOHN.

NOTE.—Law is Dhammata, the Law of Nature.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for December contains a variety of good articles. Prof. Sanday's survey of the present position of the external evidence for a view of the origin of the Fourth Gospel either identical with, or at least akin to, the traditional one will command general attention. Prof. Marshall's study on duplicate translations of "The Aramaic Text" in the Second Gospel is fully as good as any of his preceding papers. Mr. Conybeare's article on Philo's text of the Septuagint contains a literal rendering back into Greek of the Armenian text of the Questiones in Genesim. Prof. Candlish, in his paper on Dr. Dale's theology, shows how it is possible to discuss deep theological questions frankly, and yet without angry intolerance. Dr. Cox gives a striking homiletic study on James i. 22-25; and Mr. G. A. Smith of Aberdeen, and Mr. Ewing of Tiberias, expose with regret the shortcomings of the third edition of Baedeker's Palestine.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHAUCER'S "BALADE" IN THE LEGEND OF GOOD WOMEN.

Cambridge: Dec. 2, 1891.

In Michel's edition of Tristan (vol. i. pref. p. lxxxviii.) the editor quotes a ballad which he found in the Paris MS. du Roi, fonds de Saint-Victor, No. 275, fol. 45, col. 2; and which he thinks may have been written by Eustache Deschamps. It consists of three verses of eight lines each, the refrain being "Con est ma tres douce dame d'onneur"; where con is F. comme.

The first nine lines are of peculiar interest to the student of Chaucer, because it seems probable that Chaucer took from them the hint, but not much more, for the exquisite ballad in the Prologue to the Legend of Good Women, l. 249, beginning

"Hyd, Absalon, thy gilte tresses clere."

This seems the more probable, when we notice how Chaucer's refrain, viz., "My lady cometh, that al this may disteyne" has much the same significance as the refrain already mentioned.

I now quote the first nine lines of the French; the rest bear no resemblance to the English:

"Hester, Judith, Penelope, Helaine, Sarra, Tisbe, Rebeque et Sairy, Lucresce, Yseult, Genève, Chastelaine.
La tres loial nommee de Vergy,
Rachel et la dame de Fayel
Onc ne furent sy precieuz jouel
D'onneur, bonte, senz, beaute et valour
Con est ma tres douce dame d'onneur.

Se d'Absalon la grant beaute humaine," &c.

If we compare this with Chaucer's Balade, we find a resemblance in the general idea (which is that of giving a catalogue of celebrated beauties that are not comparable to the author's mistress), as well as in the way of bringing in the refrain. Further, in the catalogue of names, the following are common to both lists, taking them in Chaucer's order, viz.:—Absalom, Esther, Penelope, Isoude (or Iseult), Helen, Lucretia, Thisbe. In this there is something more than a mere coincidence. I take it to mean that Chaucer saw at once the excellence of the general idea, and how it could be improved upon; for it is not a little comforting to notice how greatly his version surpasses the original. Perhaps the most interesting point is that both versions mention Yseult. It was solely on account of the occurrence of her name that M. Michel made a copy of the poem and printed it.

Of course, there is just a possibility that the French author took a hint from Chaucer, for Froissart certainly sometimes did so. But I think the other event is the more likely. In either case the resemblance is worthy of notice.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

NEW LIGHT ON THE EXECUTION OF CHARLES I. FROM CONTEMPORARY SOURCES.

London: Nov. 30, 1891.

Being absent from town last September, I did not see Mr. Firth's letter in the ACADEMY of September 19 till three days ago, and I at once reply.

As it was my good fortune to finally settle the controversy as to the king's position when the axe fell, it is not very material whether my facts were founded on the Red Pamphlet, which dates itself May, 1649, or on its subsequent sevenfold expansion printed at the Hague in 1651, except that Mr. Firth has hinted in his last few lines a doubt as to the facts themselves. "If Gauden wrote it, they want confirmation."

The Red Pamphlet was worn out almost as soon as printed; in fact, the four extant copies (two Museum, one Bodleian, the last, by Her Majesty's gracious acceptance of it from me, in Windsor Castle) are thumb-ed copies much rubbed. It was therefore reprinted, the history continued down from Lilburn's arrest in May, 1649, to Love's imprisonment in May, 1651, and much enlarged. The scurrilous preface, however, and a reference to Cromwell as "our late usurping tyrant," were omitted. The victory of Dunbar had established the Protector's power; and Mr. Love's peril (though he was not executed till August 22, 1651) made a little civility to what is termed both in the Red Pamphlet (last paragraph) and in its enlargement (p. 93) "the present power" a matter of policy.

Mr. Firth's solitary argument for the Red Pamphlet being post-Restoration is based on these words, "our late usurping tyrant"; and he is proved wrong not only by his etymology, but also by his not having carefully read the last paragraph, which clears up any doubt that might remain.

Is Mr. Firth ignorant that at that time "late" was used in the sense of "recently" (See Webster, 1890, No. 4, and

"O woods, O fountains, hillocks, dales, and bowers,
With other echo late I taught your shades
To answer and resound far other joy."
Paradise Lost, B. 10, 860-863.)

so that "late usurping tyrant" really meant "tyrant who has recently usurped power?" Had Mr. Firth carefully read the last paragraph in the Red Pamphlet, he would have seen this confirmed. It runs thus:

"At this time Overton, Prince, Walwin, and Lilburn, who were of the levelling party, were cashiered out of Cromwell's affections since he had no use for them; before he called them saints, and now he calls them divels and giddy-headed fellows, wherefore they openly declared against the Present Power as illegal, tyrannical, and contrary to the liberty of the people of England, for which they were imprisoned in the Tower."

Now the joint declaration of these four was published once for all May 1, 1649, and against the Puritan Government, which was then "the present power." Lilburn could never have declared against the post-Restoration power, because he died in 1657.

I almost wonder that Mr. Firth did not look up, before he wrote, the printer, G. Horton; he was a freeman of the Stationers' Company, and his last work was in that same year, 1657.

The Red Pamphlet dates itself to a nicety. It absolutely revels over the incarceration of Lilburn and others in May, 1649, but says nothing about his individual and much stronger libel on June 18, nor his acquittal of high treason in the following October—matters for far greater exultation had the author known them. So this book was evidently at press before June 18, 1649.

As to its author, my article in the Antiquary for May last sets out eight conditions which only an officer of high rank and influence with the soldiers could fulfil. Whether I am right in his being Sir William Penn may be a question; but that the King's execution was delayed till the Act was passed at one p.m. on that very day, and that it would be necessary to apprise him of the approach of the fatal hour, go without saying. Yet the turning of the hour-glass, the King's idea of forcible resistance, his passing his own open coffin, and finally his "lying down," and many other minute details noted by a witness inwardly friendly to the sufferer, but outwardly strongly opposed to him, are here revealed for the first time; and the copyist of 1651 could not supplement them, as he did the history.

W. G. THORPE.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "DISMAL."

Sydenham Hill: Nov. 30, 1891.

I am afraid that Prof. Skeat goes a little too fast and a little too far when he says that "at last the etymology of this difficult word is definitely and finally settled." Surely it does not necessarily follow that, because an Anglo-French writer of the thirteenth century makes "the explicit statement that dis-mal is the same as mal jours" = "evil days," his statement must be straightway accepted as deciding the point. If the meaning of the word had even then been self-evident, he would scarcely have thought an explanation necessary. The word di = "day" had apparently already fallen into disuse, and people had begun to be somewhat in a fog as to the exact meaning of "dismal." Now I do not for one moment pretend to say that this writer was not right; but I feel bound to point out that another interpretation may be given totally different, yet, perhaps, equally plausible.

I was led to this interpretation by the consideration of the passage from Chaucer (Book of the Duchess, 1203-7), quoted by Prof. Skeat in his Dict. s.v. "dismal," which runs as follows:

"I not [know not] wel how that I began,
Ful euil reheresen hit I can;
And eek, as helpe me God withal,
I trow it was in the dismal,
That was the woundes of Egipte."

Now, some copies have, as Prof. Skeat remarks, "That was the ten woundes of Egipte"; and this ten it was that suddenly inspired me with the notion that "dismal" might well = dis (ten), and mal (evil[s], ill[s], woe[s]), so that the meaning would be "ten woes"—a meaning which is much more exact when applied to Egypt than "evil days," and is besides, so it seems to me, much more picturesque. And, grammatically speaking, there is no more to be said against it than against Prof. Skeat's interpretation. For dis is an old form of dix (see Burguy and Littré), and mal, in the nom. plur. at any rate, would, I presume, at that time, have had no s; and, even if it had, this would not make much difference, as the s would quickly have dropped off as soon as the derivation began to be obscure. Indeed, in one respect "dismal" = "evil days" is less satisfactory from a grammatical point of view; for mal as an adjective seems always, or nearly always, to precede its substantive, just as mauvais now does. If Prof. Skeat will refer to Godefroy, he will find this precession of mal in a great number of examples, and he will find also a great number of compound substantives of which the first half is mal used adjectively—among them mau jour = "mauvais jour, malheur." "Evil days" would therefore probably have been rather mal-dis than dis-mal. And again, in Chaucer's lines, "dismal," as rhyming with "withal," would seem to have the accent upon the last syllable; and this would suit my interpretation better than Prof. Skeat's, for the substantive commonly has the accent rather than the numeral or adjective joined with it.

But whether my suggestion has any claim to serious consideration or not, it seems to me pretty evident that whoever, in the passage quoted, really wrote "ten woundes," understood "dismal" in the way that I have taken it.

SCIENCE.

The Insanity of Genius, and the General Inequality of Human Faculty, physiologically considered. By J. F. Nisbet. (Ward & Downey.)

"GENIUS, insanity, idiocy, scrofula, rickets, gout, consumption, and the other members of the neuropathic family of disorders, are so many different expressions of a common evil—instability or want of equilibrium in the nervous system."

The author's standpoint and main contention are fairly, if insufficiently, indicated in the foregoing statement. To Mr. Nisbet genius is a morbid form of mind, differing from insanity not in kind, nor even in degree, but rather in respect of the cerebral areas unduly excited. To render evident the true affinities of this royal disease, the records of the lives of remarkable men are accordingly searched for "neuropathic" incidents, and deviations from the norm in the bodily or mental history of their ancestors and kindred are generally exhaustively noted. This inductive survey occupies about two-thirds of the volume, the remaining third containing a description of the physical basis of mind, a short criticism of phrenology, an examination of heredity in relation to genius, and a general estimate of the facts elicited in the aforesaid review.

The book is decidedly interesting, and in many respects suggestive. There is enough of the anecdotal element to render it palatable to the reader in search of entertainment rather than instruction, with sufficient employment of scientific method and phraseology to arrest the attention of the student proper; but, as not unfrequently happens in such cases, probably each will grumble at the concern shown for the taste of the other. The subject, however, naturally lends itself to this mixed treatment. It is putting no slight upon the book before us to characterise it as tentative, to describe it as an attempt to prepare the way for genuine scientific interpretation, rather than an orderly presentation of the relevant data with a philosophic appreciation of the same in all their bearings. If the author's claim were not so modest, his work must be pronounced a failure, unsatisfactory at once in the endeavour after comprehensiveness in respect of empirical detail, and in the narrowness of its theoretical sweep. The impressiveness of the historical review would have been considerably enhanced, and would have carried more conviction to the doubting, if the writer had not been so anxious to carry his point at all hazards. He seems to have thought the strength of his case would be impaired if a single sane man (or at least a man with sane relatives) could be cited in the roll of departed greatness.

Of the ancients we do not hear much. "Homer is reputed to have been blind." "Sophocles was accused by his sons of being unable to manage his own affairs." Of Socrates it is remarked, "Clearly the father of philosophy was an eccentric, though his insanity may have been for the most part of a purely sensorial character." "His insanity . . . for the most part," has an odd sound in reference to about the soberest intelligence of any age. Of the modern great ones the chronicle is dismal enough. One thinks with difficulty of a famous figure excluded from the gallery of fated neuropaths. Poets, painters, philosophers, statesmen, inventors, saints—all have a virus in the blood (and brain). There is an ingenious chapter on Shakspeare, in which it is sought to be shown both that he came of a sickly stock, and that his own end was due to some form of cerebral disease. The evidence adduced in respect of Shakspeare's family is somewhat intricate. The parents of the poet were long-lived, and not known to have been unhealthy; but the mortality of the children is declared "extraordinary"—the items being, the first two perished in infancy, and the average duration of life of the remaining six amounted to 41½ years. The strongest evidence for the poet's own neurotic condition is afforded by his last signatures (here reproduced in facsimile), which are suggestive of palsy. Of our latest great poet the author remarks:

"Although he attained the age of seventy-seven, Robert Browning had a curiously weak heart. . . . There is some obscurity about Browning's descent, but his father, although engaged in commerce, possessed the significant gift of verse-writing."

"How 'significant!'" (pathologically speaking), one involuntarily exclaims. As significant, perhaps, as Marlborough's signal ill-luck in having been the son of "a man of letters"! What possible value either is there in such observations as "Kant in his declining years became imbecile," "Hegel's sister was insane"?

The instances being carefully sifted, however, and a remarkable development of faculty in a particular direction being found frequently associated with nervous morbidity in either the person of the individual himself or his family, the inference to causal connexion may reasonably be suspected in the absence of an attempt to try the resources of the negative method of agreement. One wants to know not only how frequently genius is associated with morbidity, but to what extent similar physical conditions are found without the manifestation of mental superiority in any member of the family group.

But, allowing that there is a much closer relation between mental pre-eminence and a cerebral condition that may fitly be called morbid than is commonly suspected or credited, the precise significance of the concomitance is by no means obvious. Our author's language on this point is not particularly clear. A sentence such as "What runs in the blood is nerve-disorder, of which genius is the occasional outcome," or the one quoted at the beginning of this review would seem to imply a direct dependence of extraordinary mental power on a disordered cerebral state—that genius is a result of cerebral unsoundness. With all his partiality for materialistic modes of thinking and expression, we do not believe Mr. Nisbet would maintain a position so extreme. What he apparently holds is that genius could never appear in a "well-regulated family:" that it implies something exceedingly abnormal in the parental antecedents, an abnormality which is more determinative of the offspring's fate than any possible future combination of external circumstances.

The book appears to us more valuable in its denials than in its assertions. Mr. Nisbet might with advantage have expanded his polemic against the view that genius is (save quite exceptionally) transmissible or heritable. He is effective, too, in controverting the opinion that the good man is mainly the product of his age, or of a particular kind of education or environment. "Merely literary theories," again, as he hints, are rather grandiloquent than enlightening.

His own attempt "to solve the problem of what constitutes genius" centres in the reference to the localisation of brain-function as ascertained by recent physical experimentation.

"All special aptitudes and predispositions depend upon the preponderance of certain parts of the brain possessing more enduring records, more vivid recollections, a greater supply of nerve force, active or latent, than other areas, and thus providing a richer store of material, together with a more efficient means of utilising that material for intellectual or artistic operations. Here we have the key to genius in all its forms, creative and destructive, nay, to all the diversities of human faculty, whether in the direction of plus or minus."

We have here the key to genius, no doubt, in its physical pre-conditions, but the chasm has still to be crossed between the physical and the mental. Mr. Nisbet seems hardly aware that there are two problems, not one; else he would hardly venture upon this curiously self-satisfied remark that "for the first time the difficult subject of Inspiration is made to yield up some portion at least of its secret." When you have got your delicately-constructed organ, you still want your Geist to inform it. Or does our author seriously believe what he says—"All mental processes are now shown to be an unbroken material chain of causes and effects"? Such radical perversion of thought or language does not stand alone. We are told also that "in the modern theory of brain-function there is no place for that bugbear of the older metaphysicians—the will." Newer metaphysicians still find a difficulty in laying the same spectre. It is the more strange he should pour contempt on the subjective side of mental philosophy, as he sees clearly the limits to the play of external forces as evocative of what we term "original" cerebral functioning, siding with Wallace and James against Darwin and Spencer. Perhaps, if he speculates a little longer, he may come to see that the assimilation of the internal factor to the objective external leaves the "spontaneous variations" or "growth-forces" as mysterious as they were before.

There are many minor points to which exception might be taken. Not a few will demur to the assertion, in respect of the second name, that "licentiousness was the characteristic of Byron and Shelley," or question that "it may be doubted whether Goethe was a man of strong passions." The dogmatism is delicious of the sentence "nothing can be more certain, scientifically speaking, than that the founder of Islam possessed no other source of inspiration than the morbid workings of his brain." All the same, he was "in a great measure sincere," and [we are glad to be assured] as much may be said of all great religious teachers and prophets, both before his time and since." Mr. Nisbet is occasionally as ill a practical observer as he is a rash theorist.

"Intense convictions of all kinds, including the most bigoted professions of religion, will generally be found associated with an ailing, sickly, or nervously unsound constitution. On the other hand, the man of robust health is of necessity tolerant and many-sided in his views."

On the contrary, the finest specimens of intolerance and one-sidedness are to be found among the men "of robust health." Another minor matter—which is, to say the least of it, irritating—is the unsatisfactory character of the reference to authorities throughout the work. In only one or two instances have we chapter and verse given, usually merely the title of the book at large. This is unscholarly, to say no more, but it is only of a piece with the general looseness of style and arrangement of the book as a whole. The few statistics offered—a very important matter in the present case—inspire us with no confidence, and slightly-supported conjectures are sown broad-cast.

Still, after all deductions, the service rendered by the book is undeniable. The accumulation of so large a body of neuropathic facts, if somewhat indiscriminate, is an indispensable preliminary to an inquiry into the laws governing the general inequality of human faculty; and the author's glimpses and guesses at truth are not to be despised because that truth is a partial one.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

DR. F. STEINGASS—compiler of Arabic-English and English-Arabic Dictionaries, and the devoted assistant of Sir R. F. Burton in correcting the proofs, &c., of his Arabian Nights—has received a subsidy from the Secretary of State for India towards the publication of the Persian-English Dictionary, upon which he is known to have been long engaged. Originally intended only as a revised edition of Johnson's enlargement of Wilkins-Richardson's Persian, Arabic, and English Dictionary, by a reduction of the Persian element and an increase of the Arabic, the work has gradually grown to be of a much more comprehensive character. A special feature of it will be a liberal inclusion of the many Arabic words in Persian literature, and also in colloquial Persian; while the Persian vocabulary will similarly comprise the technical and other modern words to be found in the most recent works, such as the Shah's Diaries. The Dictionary will form an imperial octavo volume of about 1600 pages, and will be issued early in the coming year by Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co., publishers of the India Office.

PROF. MAURICE BLOOMFIELD, of Johns Hopkins, has reprinted from the Journal of the American Oriental Society a third series of "Contributions to the Interpretation of the Veda," continuing his former method of interpreting the early mantras by help of the later literature—Brahmanas, Sutras, commentaries, and classical legends. He first deals at considerable length with the story of Indra and Namuci, which he makes intelligible by piecing together many scattered allusions. Perhaps the most novel feature in this re-constructed story is the scene where Namuci (the asura) makes Indra (the deva) drunk with surū (brandy), instead of his own favourite soma. Secondly, he takes up the two dogs of Yama, and shows how their identification with the sun and the moon in the Brahmanas explains many of the conflicting attributes assigned to them in the Vedic mantras. Lastly, he discusses the much-disputed passage (Rig Veda, x, 17, 1, 2), which describes the conjugal exploits of Saranyū, his explanation being that it is a brahmodya (riddle or charade), not, as has hitherto been held, either a fragment, or a story in a form so condensed as to be foreign to Indian habits of narration. As the basis of the riddle he finds a cosmogonic conception, with which a number of mythological inventions have been combined to make up a story of a composite character.

DR. DE CARA has published a paper which he read before the recent Oriental Congress under the title Della Identità degli Etehi e de' Pelasgi dimostrata per la Ceramica pre-ellenica e pre-ellenica (Rome: Befani). Like all the author's other works, it is distinguished by an acquaintance with the most recent results of oriental and archaeological research, and the views expressed in it are novel and suggestive. He seeks to show that the Pelasgians of Greek tradition represent the Hittites of Asia Minor and Syria, and that the culture of Mykenae had its ultimate origin in the Hittite empire whose significance is but just beginning to be understood.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

SOCIETY OF LITERATURE.—(Wednesday, Nov. 25.)

THE REV. DR. C. TAYLOR, vice-president, in the chair. Mr. E. W. Brabrook read a paper on "The Origin and Progress of the Society." It originated in a suggestion made by Bishop Burgess, of St. David's, in October, 1820, for the establishment of a society somewhat resembling the French Academy of Belles Lettres, which was communicated by Sir B. Bloomfield to King George IV.

He entertained the proposal with great cordiality, became the patron of the proposed society, and assigned out of his Privy Purse an annual sum of 1100 guineas to be applied by the society in rewards for literary merit. These rewards were distributed in ten pensions of 100 guineas per annum to distinguished literary men, including Coleridge, Malthus, Roscoe, and Sharon Turner, and in an annual gift of two gold medals, among the recipients of which were Washington Irving, Henry Hallam, Walter Scott, and Robert Southey. On the death of George IV., his liberal benefactions were discontinued, but the author was of opinion that their discontinuance was a blessing in disguise. Since then, King William IV., and, until recently, her present Majesty, had been donors of 100 guineas a year to the funds of the society; and it had also derived, from a bequest of the late Dr. Richards, certain funds to be used in the publication of ancient inedited manuscripts. The author gave a brief statement of the publications of the society under this bequest and out of its general funds, and of the other ways in which it had sought to fulfil the object of its royal founder.—A discussion followed the paper, maintained by the Chairman, Dr. Douglas Lithgow, Mr. R. B. Holt, Mr. Herbert J. Reid (librarian), and Mr. Percy W. Ames (secretary).

MANCHESTER GOETHE SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Nov. 25.)

THE REV. F. F. CORNISH in the chair.—Mr. Cornish read a paper entitled "Torquato Tasso in its relation to Goethe's Early Life at Weimar and his Italian Journey." Starting with Goethe's remark to Eckermann (1827), that Torquato Tasso had had its origin in a blending, in Goethe's mind, of his own life and person with those of the real Tasso, the lecturer proceeded to illustrate this text by extracts from Goethe's Letters and by a sketch of his inner life during his first ten years at Weimar. Goethe's Tasso has its being in a somewhat artificial world, and the crises of the drama are only fraught with consequence because of the charmed atmosphere in which they happen. Of the characters Alphonso seems meant for the Duke Carl August, but the resemblance does not go very deep. Antonio had various prototypes, but cannot be fixed upon any one in particular. He is the practical man who, by his nature, is in opposition to the poet. Leonora Sanvitale has no strongly marked individuality, and her mild revelry with the Princess in Platonic affection for Tasso scarcely rises to the level of a motive. Leonora, the Princess, stands for the Frau von Stein, and this could be abundantly proved by a comparison of Goethe's Letters with the earlier scenes. Their very conversations are worked into the play. In studying the question how far Tasso represents Goethe himself, attention should be given to the "Lenz Episode" of Goethe's searilite at Weimar. Lenz (1750—1792), one of Goethe's friends in his life at Strasburg, showed many of the qualities which distinguish the Tasso of the play from Goethe; he visited Weimar in 1776, enlisted the sympathies of the Frau von Stein, and had to leave in consequence of an offence which, although unknown, seems to have presented an analogy to the chief incident in Tasso. In giving a sketch of Lenz's life, the lecturer discussed the hypothesis first advanced by Fritz von Stein, that Goethe's mysterious correspondent Krafft, whom he supported for years in Ilmenau, was no other than Lenz, a hypothesis which is rendered improbable, though it is not actually disproved, by our present knowledge. In spite of the strong infusion of Lenz in Tasso (which Goethe himself admits), there is also in it much of the Goethe of the Werther period. In Weimar Goethe had found a place of refuge from the, to him, unbearable conditions of his Frankfort life; and there he lived mainly in the friendship of the Frau von Stein, in his studies and in his official work, in comparative indifference to the outside world. This period of contentment and rest is reflected in the earlier part of Tasso; but in the later we can already see the working of a new spirit, the first clear symptoms of which are perhaps shown in Goethe's letters to the Frau von Stein from Leipzig, at Christmas, 1782, leading on to the period of discontent and unrest, of new ideas and new ideals, which was to issue in his journey to Italy. During these first ten years of Goethe's life at Weimar a great change had come over the educational life of Germany. The school of useful knowledge and natural methods represented by Basedow and the Philanthropists, the successor of the old classical school which Goethe connected with the name of Heyne, had in its turn been superseded by the new classical learning, whose main advocate, F. A. Wolf, defined it as the knowledge of human nature as exhibited in antiquity. With the ideas of this new school, Goethe, through his study of Winckelmann (with whose views he had first become acquainted through the Leipzig professor, Oeser) was in profound sympathy; and this made his Italian journey so important and fruitful for him. It is clear how small a portion of Goethe's activities at the time finds a place in Tasso. There are certainly many touches reflecting his Weimar experiences, such as his love of seclusion and the morbid symptoms produced by it, his need of contact with the world, his fondness for Weimar, and his occasional finding fault with the Duke; but of the new ideas working in him there are only faint glimpses in the play. Goethe, then, began Tasso when happy and contented at Weimar; he carried it on during that period of divine unrest which issued into his flight to Italy; he completed it in the latter part of his Italian journey, before he had had time to sum up its total effect upon his life. It is mainly a monument of the phase of his life, the other records of which are his Diary and his Letters to the Frau von Stein. This explains its limitations and its lack of interest as a drama, and this likewise makes it so worthy of the Goethe student's attention.—In the short discussion that followed, Dr. Hager mentioned an earlier sketch of Tasso, in which the place of Antonio was taken by a secretary of the duke, who is Tasso's rival as a poet.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

It is considered more than doubtful whether the exhibition of the "Old" Society is an average one for the winter. There is quite as much finished work as usual, but that is no particular recommendation. We would rather that the gathering of works went nearer to justifying the title under which the exhibition is held. "Winter Exhibition of Sketches and Studies," says the title-page of the catalogue; but as a matter of fact the true sketches are chiefly the work of artists like Miss Clara Montalba and Mr. Arthur Melville, whose efforts at all times are sketches—or are so held to be by certain canons of criticism—instead of being finished pictures. Mr. Carl Haag sends nothing. Nor does Mr. North, who has done so much in the way of popular prettiness. Mr. Alfred Hunt gives no sign of his existence, yet surely his cabinet of sketches has not been emptied. The absence of Mr. Henry Moore, though as much to be regretted, is more comprehensible.

Of the artists who do exhibit, few, I think, are fully up to their best level, so that there are not so many drawings as usual which the connoisseur of refinement and of real attainment would desire to remove to his own portfolios. Sir John Gilbert's large loose drawing of "The Squire's Daughters" fails somewhat in the realisation of these young ladies. One can hardly fancy Sir John Gilbert addressing himself with much earnestness to the representation of the contemporary maiden, whether the athletic and healthy damsel of the smarter world, or the spectacled and over-read daughter of the professional classes. But his gipsies, over their gipsy fire, and his wild bit of woodland landscape, leave nothing to be desired that a sketch should supply; and it is agreeable to recognise that the sense of style is ever present with this veteran master. Mr. Albert Goodwin—like Sir John Gilbert himself, though in another field—has many of the older traditions. Rarely does he transgress the laws of composition; never is he content with offering us a cleverly realised fragment. He gives some of his best thought to the securing a balance of parts, and so he does nearly always that which the more prejudiced and the less educated of the younger school do never at all. He is a master of design. But though this winter we behold Mr. Goodwin in all his variety, there is perhaps scarcely one drawing—at all events scarcely one drawing of importance—in which he is absolutely at his best. His "Whitby," which possibly aims at the least, or which uses the fewest means—which is not quite the same thing—is, in its own way, entirely successful. More than once before has this very fascinating artist made Whitby the scene of some audacious exercise in colour. Its red roofs I remember in other work of his smitten to absolute scarlet by the westerling sun. This year no such effect is attempted; the "Whitby" of the present exhibition is something of a clear grey—the drawing's charm depending much less upon colour than upon line. The arrangement of line—always among the higher sources of delight to the cultivated—is an arrangement that one follows with unbroken interest, from end to end.

Of Mr. Mathew Hale's drawings, one strikes me as particularly happy under the necessary limitations of its scheme of colour. This is a view in the "British"—or is it a misprint and does he really mean in the "Bristol" Channel? Mr. Eyre Walker, who knows the northern landscape—not so much its obvious grandeur as its little considered beauty of detail—realises very charmingly the clear autumnal aspect of Helton Dale Beck; and elsewhere he is more stately and visibly, but not more truly, poetic. In at least one of his drawings, Mr. David Murray has attacked a very difficult subject. Mr. Herbert Marshall is content generally with a picturesque treatment of more familiar effects. His agreeable reminiscences of fortunate colour in the work of man and in the work of nature make him rightly enough acceptable to an extensive public. He is the incarnation of that respectability in painting which is just above the pure bourgeois; but his art may not be impressive to the initiated. For, like the measured, craftsmanship of Octave Feuillet, in literature—like that of Mr. William Black or Mr. Besant, it may be, in the production of the lengthy English novel—the thing most certain about it is that it will shock or surprise no one. Mr. Herbert Marshall—like these admirable purveyors of blameless entertainment—will, I know, never blesser les convenances.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

THE EGYPT EXPLORATION FUND.

Messrs. GILBERT & RIVINGTON have published, on behalf of the Egypt Exploration Fund, a handsomely illustrated quarto pamphlet, containing a report of the work done during last winter, together with an historical introduction by Miss Amelia B. Edwards.

The work done was twofold. M. Edouard Naville excavated the mounds of Ahnas or Henassieh, which cover the site of the Heracleopolis of Greek historians, the Hanes of the Bible. His report has already been printed in the ACADEMY of July 25. He failed, unfortunately, to discover any relics of the IXth and Xth Dynasties, of which Heracleopolis is known to have been the capital; for the mounds had evidently been dug over by Greek and Arab plunderers. Nevertheless, his excavations yielded an abundant harvest of Egyptian and Coptic sculptures. The former have been ceded to the Fund; the latter were reserved for the Ghizeh Museum.

The other portion represents the first-fruits of the archaeological survey of Egypt, which the Fund has now undertaken, in addition to its original work of excavation. Mr. Percy E. Newberry as a trained Egyptologist, accompanied by Mr. G. Willoughby Fraser as an engineer, and joined later by Mr. Blackden as an artist, commenced the new enterprise at the well-known tombs of Beni-Hasan. Here they spent nearly six months, making an accurate survey of the rock-hewn tombs, and copying, tracing, and photographing the hieroglyphic texts and wall-paintings for which these tombs are celebrated. Their final report will appear later on in an elaborate memoir, to be illustrated with numerous photolithographic and coloured plates. But this preliminary report contains many interesting and novel facts. Mr. Newberry has succeeded in dating most of the tombs, showing that they were the mausoleums of five generations of a powerful family, who ruled as vassal princes during the XIth Dynasty. He estimates that the wall-paintings cover a surface of about 12,000 square feet, though in former times there must have been considerably more.

"Much of this is in a fearful state of dilapidation, and year by year it is getting worse. Large flakes of painted plaster are falling from the walls; many of the scenes have faded away so completely as to be hardly distinguishable; and in a few years' time, if active measures are not taken to preserve the tombs, little will remain on their walls to tell of their former beauty."

No words could speak more forcibly on behalf of the objects of the archaeological survey of Egypt. Such as they now are, the tombs of Beni Hasan are preserved for future study; for Mr. Newberry brought back with him to England outline tracings of all the wall-paintings in six out of the eight painted tombs, as well as copies of all the hieroglyphic inscriptions, a fine series of coloured drawings by Mr. Blackden, and nearly 100 photographs.

The exceptional interest of these vanishing records of the past may be judged from the following passage in Mr. Newberry's report:

"The wall-paintings of these tombs furnish us with the fullest, and by far the most curious, representations we possess of the daily life of the ancient Egyptians of the Middle Kingdom. There is hardly an incident in ordinary life that is not here delineated. We see represented the princes in their robes, with their wives and children; their household officers, from the herald to the sandal-bearer; their agriculturists and their artisans. Even their barbers and their chiropodists, their pet dogs and their monkeys are figured. In the tomb of Amen are represented the personal attendants on the Lady Hotept. These are her fan-bearer and mirror-bearer, a woman carrying ointments, another with linen, and another with jewelry. Goldsmiths, potters, weavers, glass-blowers, bakers, ropemakers, laundresses, carpenters, artists, and sculptors are represented at work. There are several battle-scenes, in one of which we see a party of Egyptians attacking a fortress with a testudo. There are also hunting and fowling scenes; and in the tomb of Baqta III. are figured a large number of wild animals and birds, each with its ancient name written above it in hieroglyphic characters. In the same tomb are also represented many of the games, from draughts to playing with the ball, that were indulged in on the banks of the Nile more than 4500 years ago. And what makes all these pictures doubly interesting is the fact that they nearly all have explanatory notes in hieroglyphs written just above them. Over the head of the chiropodist, for instance, is the inscription, art ant, 'doing the toe-nails.'"

Messrs. Newberry and Fraser have already left England for their second season in Egypt, and will be followed somewhat later by Mr. Blackden. Their work for this winter will be to survey, copy, and photograph the remaining historic antiquities from Beni-Hasan southward towards Tel el-Amarna, including the rest of the Beni-Hasan tombs, the tombs of el-Bersaeh (XIIth Dynasty), the Speos Artemidos, and the tombs at Isbedeh. It should be added that this archaeological survey is supported by special subscriptions.

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

HOW ARE THE MONUMENTS OF EGYPT TO BE PRESERVED?

Cairo, Nov. 17, 1891.

I have hitherto refrained from expressing any views in regard to the preservation and disposal of the monuments of ancient Egypt—partly because the subject has been unhappily involved in a maze of political controversy, partly because I hoped that the Egyptian Government would seriously consider the question in accordance with the opinions and wishes of scientific experts. As this hope seems to be indefinitely postponed, I venture to put on paper the results of many years' experience of Egypt, of many discussions with archaeologists of different nationalities who are interested in Egyptian antiquities, and of much thought upon my own part. I may say, without boasting, that there are few, if any, who have so large a knowledge as myself of the monuments which still exist between Cairo and Assuan, or who have been brought into closer unofficial relations with those self-constituted guardians and destroyers of them, the native fellahin.

While progress has been made in other departments of state in Egypt, the department of antiquities has remained pretty much where it was when it was first founded by the energy and scientific enthusiasm of Mariette. Though the Museum of Cairo has been moved from its tiny quarters at Bulaq to its present palatial home at Gizeh, no changes have been made in its administrative organisation and mode of work. Principles and functions, which were necessary in the case of a semi-private institution planted by foreigners upon uncongenial ground, have become inapplicable, and therefore harmful, to its modern successor. The Egyptian Museum has now developed into an institution worthy of being placed on a footing of equality with those of London, of Paris, or of Berlin; and it ought consequently to be managed on the same principles, and to direct its energies and attention to the fulfilment of the same objects. That confusion of various functions, which is characteristic of an inchoate institution in a partially civilised community, ought to be a thing of the past: the time has come for the administration of the Gizeh Museum to be freed from the burden of multifold duties, none of which can be performed thoroughly, and which only oblige the true and proper work of a museum to be neglected.

When the Museum of Bulaq was established, the first thing Mariette had to do was to save from destruction such ancient monuments as still remained, and to fill the rooms of the building by means of excavations conducted under his own supervision. There was no one else besides the director of the museum who cared to look after the older monuments of the country, or who could be trusted to supervise the work of excavation. The arrangement and cataloguing of the objects preserved in the museum went hand in hand with the excavations by means of which they were obtained; and the collection itself was still so small that its founder and director had plenty of leisure to make expeditions into Upper Egypt, and personally inspect the monuments in whose preservation he had shown a unique interest.

But the conditions under which the Museum of Bulaq was started have ceased to exist. In place of the unpretending collection of antiquities which Mariette brought together by his own indefatigable exertions, Egypt now possesses a large and important museum, the management and development of which for the use of science is sufficient to tax the strength of a large staff of officials. At the same time, the government has awakened—to some extent, at least—to the necessity of preserving those monuments of the past which are at once the property of the state and the means of attracting an ever-increasing number of rich visitors to Egypt. The country, moreover, is patrolled by an efficient force of police under foreign officers, and the Board of Public Works is filled with men who are educated and incorruptible.

If, then, the Museum of Gizeh is to take the place which properly belongs to it by the side of the other great museums of the civilised world, if it is to perform efficiently the duties which archaeological science demands from it, it must be reconstituted on the same basis as the museums of Europe and America. Functions which do not belong to a museum must be handed over to others to whom they more properly appertain, and the director and his staff must thus be left free to do the work which alone can make the Museum of Gizeh of use to the scientific world. At present, not only does it not possess a catalogue; there are no labels even attached to the objects exposed to view which are intelligible to the majority of visitors. Many objects are still lying in unopened cases, or unarranged. But the staff are not to blame. When the director and one of his assistants are away during part of the year, superintending excavations in Upper Egypt or the engineer's duty of erecting iron gates, how is it possible for the proper work of a museum to be carried on? The mutilation of some of the most precious monuments of Upper Egypt some years ago showed how disastrous is the combination of incompatible functions to the safe keeping of the monuments themselves. The backward state of the Gizeh Museum is only a temporary loss to science; but the destruction of the tombs of el-Bersheh is irreparable.

What, therefore, I would urge in the interests of science, is that the preservation of the Egyptian monuments be transferred from the administration of the Museum, who are powerless to punish offenders, to the police, the natural guardians of the property of the state. Let the police be made responsible for the safety of the great monuments of ancient Egypt, and there will no longer be any fear of their further destruction. Secondly, let it be understood that the proper work of the Museum is to look after its own treasures, and make them available for scientific study, not to excavate. What would become of the British Museum, in spite of its large staff of officers, if it were to occupy its attention with controlling, much more directing, all the excavations which are made in Britain? And yet this is the impossible task which the Gizeh Museum, with its insufficient staff, is now called upon to perform. Like its responsibility for the preservation of the ancient monuments, it is a survival from a past and utterly different order of things. One of the most unfortunate results of this survival has been the importation of politics and political chauvinism into questions which are, and ought to be, purely scientific. The antiquities of Egypt belong to the archaeologist, not to the politician; and scholars of the most various nationalities have an interest in their discovery and preservation. France leads the way with its Egyptian Institute, its Champollion, its Mariette, and its Maspero; but England follows close behind, as well as Germany, Italy, and Russia. It is for the scholars, and not for the politicians, to determine how the memorials of the past, which the soil of Egypt has preserved for us, can best be made serviceable to the progress of science.

A. H. SAYCE.

[WE append the following telegram which appeared in the Times of Tuesday last :

“Cairo: Dec. 1, 1891.

“The Government has asked the Caisse de la Dette for £50,000 from the general reserve fund on behalf of the Antiquities Department; but, before granting so large a sum, the Caisse will probably require the appointment of a commission to study the purposes of its employment. It is hoped that this opportunity will be availed of to make a searching investigation into the management of the department generally, which has for a long time excited dissatisfaction amongst all nationalities, and is discreditable to the country. The Ghizeh Museum especially is without a catalogue, its exhibits are unlabelled, and its immense quantities of valuable objects are stored away from public view, to the utter disappointment of visitors, who desire to do more than merely pass an idle hour in the building. The monuments scattered throughout the country are inefficiently protected, and much irreparable mischief has been, and still is, caused by theft and wantonness.”—ED. ACADEMY.]

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. GEORGE REID—who was elected last August to be president of the Royal Scottish Academy, in succession to the late Sir W. F. Douglas—has received the customary honour of knighthood from the Queen.

Two exhibitions will be opened next week at the Fine Art Society's in New Bond-street: a series of water-colour drawings of Kentish scenery, by Mr. A. W. Weedon; and a collection of drawings illustrating Shelley's Poems, by Mrs. Evelyn Heathcote. Messrs. Boussod, Valadon & Co. will likewise have on view, in New Bond-street, a collection of French and Russian bronzes, from the ateliers of MM. Susse Frères, of Paris.

WE cannot say that we are at all at one with a writer in an evening contemporary, who—forgetful apparently of all that has been done in the way of exhibiting Sir Joshua Reynolds during all these later years—suggests that the Academy would do well to gather together his paintings, by way of celebrating a certain anniversary. As a matter of fact, not only was a Sir Joshua exhibition of extraordinary importance held at the Grosvenor Gallery—in its palmy days, but a few years ago—but that very winter the show of his work at Burlington House was considerable. And there has scarcely been a single winter when this essentially popular master of English portraiture has not been largely represented. About Sir Joshua's paintings public curiosity has been satiated, and criticism has not another word to say. Moreover, as every student knows, a vast proportion of his painted work has suffered greatly and irretrievably by his tendency to technical experiment. His high and admirable reputation will live, of course, in some degree, until the pictures have quite perished. But it will live longest of all in the noble mezzotints wrought after the most charming of his canvases; and, though the money value of these does seem to be excessive—seeing that the savour of original work is of necessity denied them—they may claim at all events that measure of value which has already been accorded, and which will be accorded again, to the plates upon which Marc Antonio Raimondy translated the design of Raphael. Yet one may admire Sir Joshua and the reproductions of him very much, without for a moment desiring that there should be yet another Reynolds exhibition.

THE Duke of St. Albans, lord-lieutenant of the county, will open on December 17 a collection of original drawings for book-illustrations, including a great number of sketches and designs by Thomas Stothard, which Mr. Felix Joseph has given to the Nottingham Art Museum.

A certain interest is, it seems, being manifested in the question of the action of corporations with regard to artistic affairs, the Corporation of Brighton having lately “put its foot into it”—so it would appear—by the acceptance of a collection of about thirty oil pictures which, it is roundly asserted, have hardly any material or artistic value. We regret that Brighton should be the scene of the error that has been committed; for in a place like Brighton the public picture gallery is sure to be much visited, and the educational effect of the presence of unworthy canvases is, perhaps, correspondingly large and injurious. A bad picture—a picture painted by a person who would have been employed much more worthily as a linen-draper's salesman, or in honest carpenter's or joiner's work, does as much harm as the commonest or showiest of music, or as the “literature” of the smaller sporting or society newspapers. In a word, it is not Art. At Brighton, moreover, whose public gallery has recently been enriched, either by gift or bequest, by the addition of a possible Greuze, an important Honthorst, an interesting Ruysdael, and a Sir Thomas Laurence of historic value—a portrait of that prince who was a model of Turveydopian deportment—it is especially regrettable that there should be an inroad of entirely insignificant pictures. And it is no doubt true that such an occurrence as is now reported gives occasion for grave doubt as to whether our large—though it may be not our largest—provincial corporations are well advised in their method of procedure in the acquisition or refusal of what profess to be works of art. It is certain that, if critics of reputation, associated for the purpose with one or two of those very few practical painters who have any historical knowledge of art, were consulted by the public bodies, with freedom and confidence, far fewer mistakes would be committed than are now made in the gathering together of that which no doubt is in all cases intended to be as far as possible a worthy local collection.

THE Art Journal concludes the year with an excellent number, prefaced with an etching by M. A. P. Massé after Mr. Stanley Berkeley's very vigorous picture of a battle in the civil war, called “For God and the King.” Not the least valuable of the articles is Mr. W. M. Conway's “Lesson of a Persian Carpet,” which gives the latest opinion of the learned as to the origin of their designs, and illustrates the new theory by a particular carpet. This is in the possession of Mr. Sidney Colvin, and recalls the descriptions by Arab writers of the famous carpet of King Chosroës I., Sassanian King of Persia. The writer of the note on Veronese's “Vision of St. Helena,” in the National Gallery, seems to be under the impression that he has made a discovery in tracing the origin of the design to an engraving after a drawing by Raphael: but of course this is a very old story. The writer also appears to be unaware that there were Italian engravers before Marc Antonio—notably one Andrea Mantegna.

THE programme of the Art Journal for the New Year is promising; and we are to have fiction and poetry in connexion with art, in addition to the more ordinary items.

A VERY successful autogravure has just been published by the Autotype Company after “The Hay Wain,” by Constable, a picture which, thanks to the generosity of Mr. Henry Vaughan, is now one of the permanent treasures of the National Gallery. The engraving is of a large size, and is specially successful in rendering the mingled power and delicacy of the luminous sky and the strong chiaroscuro of the whole picture, which, as all know, is one of the most important in the history of both British and French landscape art.

MR. ARTHUR ACKERMAN, of Regent-street, has sent us a selection of the Christmas publications issued by Messrs. Prang & Co. of Boston. The best of them are the booklets illustrated by Mr. Louis K. Harlow, where the tints are most delicately reproduced. There are also cards of the ordinary character, and pictures of excessive dimensions. From Messrs. Mowbray & Co., of Oxford, come a number of cards, all of a religious character, some of which are illustrated with photographs after well-known paintings.

THE STAGE.

"THE TAMING OF THE SHREW" IN FRENCH.

Paris: Nov. 23, 1891.

"LA MÈGÈRE APPRIVOISÉE" is the title chosen by M. Paul Delair for his adaptation, in four short acts, of the principal scenes of "The Taming of the Shrew." The author, in order to avoid offending the fastidious taste of the audience of the Comédie Française, has boldly suppressed the Prologue, thrown Tinker Sly and his companions overboard, and has toned down the characters and language of Petrucchio and Katharina; in fact, little remains of the original play but an abridgment. Yet the result is an interesting, well-written, "genteel" comedy, full of phantasy and pretty conceits, acted to perfection, set off to advantage with picturesque scenery, dresses of exquisite taste, ingenious stage arrangements, and an ensemble worthy of the high reputation of the Théâtre Français.

Coquelin senior, in the part of Petrucchio, is, to use a French expression, étourdissant. His versatile talent, his rapid and yet distinct utterance, his fancies and humour, are displayed to perfection in a part which will rank among his most brilliant "creations." His younger brother, as Grumio, is, in attire and by-play, funny beyond expression; while Jean Coquelin (the elder's son), as the cook, makes the most of the few lines he has to say before having a dish thrown at his head. The minor parts are, one and all, played by leading members of the illustrious company. But Mlle. Marsy carries off the palm; her Katharina is above praise. In the first two acts she proves herself to be the loveliest shrill-tongued, angry "she-devil" that ever paced the streets of Padua; in the third, she is pitifully humiliated and delightfully cast-down in attire and demeanour; while in the last scenes she appears as the most enchanting, the most submissive, "the prettiest Kate in Christendom." Tall and handsome, and of noble bearing, clad in embroidered brocade, her rich auburn locks falling in heavy clusters over her fair shoulders, Katharina looks as if she were one of Titian's Venetian beauties just stepped out of her frame.

Not so long ago the Daly Company gave Parisians an American reading of Shakspeare, with Miss Ada Rehan in the part of the bouncing, boisterous termagant Katharina. The American jeune première quite took the breath away from her Parisian audience, while her fellow actors were deemed not above the common. Now, notwithstanding the objections that captious critics may urge against M. Delair's free "adaptation," it is a thoroughly artistic piece of work, and in every respect superior to the more correct, but rather tedious, version of the American troupe.

C. NICHOLSON.

STAGE NOTES.

WE are informed by Mr. J. T. Grein that the next performance of the Independent Theatre Society will be given in the first week of January. The programme will include an authorised translation of Maeterlinck's one-act play "L'Intruse," by Mr. C. W. Jarvis; "The Minister's Call," a play in one act by Mr. Arthur Symons, founded on Mr. Frank Harris's "A Modern Idyll"; and a version of Théodore de Banville's one-act play "Le Baiser," translated into English couplets by Mr. John Gray.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. HENSCHEL gave his third Symphony Concert last Thursday week, when Master Jean Gérardy performed Volkmann's difficult cello Concerto in A minor, a rather pompous name for the work, which only consists of one movement. The music, Hungarian in character (the opening theme recalls that of the Andante of Schubert's Symphony in C), and evidently written as a show piece, was brilliantly rendered by the youthful and gifted virtuoso. A spirited performance of Beethoven's Symphony in A proved another attractive feature of the programme. Mr. John Probert and Mr. Plunket Greene took part in the "Charfreitags-Zauber" from "Parsifal."

The Saturday programme at the Crystal Palace included Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and to this work Mr. Manns and his orchestra always devote their best energies. Master Gérardy again played the above-mentioned Volkmann Concerto. Mr. Philip Newbury sang with taste and feeling "Salve! dimora" from "Faust."

M. Ysaye led Schubert's Quartet in D. Minor at the Popular Concert on Monday evening with skill and great power. The tenderness of his tone in the theme and variations was most impressive; he was ably supported by Messrs. Ries, Straus, and De Munck. Mlle. Szumowska, the new pianist, is decidedly clever: her technique is irreproachable, and, moreover, her playing is full of life. In selecting Chopin's Sonata in B minor she set herself no easy task. The lady cannot as yet draw from the piano those yearning, plaintive tones which the music demands; but she is young, and time and experience will probably soon add what as yet may be lacking. She was encored, and gave Chopin's Etude in F from Op. 25. Mlle. Szumowska afterwards took part, with M. Ysaye, in Beethoven's Sonata in C minor for pianoforte and violin. Her style of playing was not sufficiently broad in the Allegro, nor was there enough pathos in the Adagio; but the lively and humorous Scherzo and Finale were rendered in a crisp and brilliant manner. M. Ysaye performed Beethoven's Romance in F with his usual success. Mrs. Helen Trust pleased much in two of Massenet's delicate songs.

Mlle. Clothilde Kleeberg gave the second of two pianoforte recitals at Prince's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. She gave an exceedingly neat and intelligent reading of Bach's "Italian" Concerto and also of Beethoven's C minor variations, but the tone was at times heavy. In Schumann's long, difficult, and seldom-heard Sonata in F sharp minor there was some excellent playing, especially in the two middle movements; but there was not sufficient poetry, nor did she always catch the inner meaning of the music. Mlle. Kleeberg was heard to great advantage in short solos by Schubert, Schumann, and other modern composers. Two of Chopin's Preludes were neatly played, but the pianist did not succeed in making the same composer's "Allegro de Concert" interesting. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

. In the closing years of the Century the grandest spectacle presented to the world is the spread of the English-Speaking race. "The Empire of the English" girdles the globe. It is in this world-wide sense that the title of this New Work, "THE ENGLISH IMPERIAL ATLAS," has been chosen. It is arranged throughout from an English point of view, and aims at being the Standard Atlas for English households throughout the world. While amply meeting all the requirements of General Geography, the Home Country, the British Colonies, and all English-Speaking countries have been treated in very full detail.

For General Completeness THE ENGLISH IMPERIAL ATLAS is not equalled by any other English Atlas at the price. It contains 108 pages of Maps, comprising 70 full-page and folio Maps, and 150 smaller Maps, Plans, and Insets, or 220 Maps in all. The Gazetteer, which has been compiled from the latest sources, contains the results of recent Census returns, and has entries for about 55,000 places, which are described and located.

THE CLOUD OF WITNESS

A DAILY SEQUENCE OF GREAT THOUGHTS FROM MANY MINDS
FOLLOWING THE CHRISTIAN SEASONS.

By the Hon. Mrs. LYTTELTON GELL.

With an Introductory Note by the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

It is the object of this little book to emphasise some point of the moral or religious teaching connected with each Sunday and Holy-day throughout the year, and to present it in its different aspects for Daily Meditation on each succeeding week-day, illustrated by a sequence of Extracts in Prose and Poetry from the Great Writers of all ages.

It is thus a Golden Treasury of lofty thoughts and aspirations, systematically culled from ancient and modern, from religious and secular, writers of every creed.

A copious Subject-Index has been compiled to enable its readers to use it as a storehouse of quotations upon every main point of moral and spiritual import.

The great National Festivals, like Christmas, the New Year, and Easter, are similarly illustrated with thoughts and reflections specially connected with the season; and the chief turning-points in the individual and family life are also treated upon the same system. The associations of Infancy and Youth, Birthdays, Betrothal and Marriage, of Sickness, Convalescence, and Death, all find their appropriate setting in words often as old as civilisation and hallowed by the affection of countless generations.

Special pages have been prepared on writing paper to receive the dates of events in personal history; such will serve as a Family Record of the great anniversaries in our lives and the lives of those around us.

THE INSCRIPTIONS of COS. By W. R. Paton

and E. L. HICKS. With a Map of Cos.

It seems most desirable that the inscriptions of the more important Greek islands should be published in separate form, as the islands were from the earliest times, and still remain, distinct communities, most retentive of their peculiarities. The Editor spent some time in Cos in 1883; and, as he found many unpublished inscriptions, and convinced himself that others had been inaccurately edited, he determined to undertake the preparation of a Catalogue of all the Cosan Inscriptions known to him. He has received throughout the assistance of Rev. E. L. Hicks, who also contributes a full Introduction on the History of Cos.

IN SCRIPTURE LANDS: New Views of Sacred Places

By EDWARD L. WILSON.

With 150 Original Illustrations engraved from Photographs taken by the Author.

"Mr. Wilson has written a delightful volume. There is freshness in the free and sparkling style, and, strange to say, there is freshness in many of the subjects. A devout believer, he is mainly guided by the sacred narrative and by geography; but he takes tradition for what it is worth, and it is often worth a good deal in countries where everybody is eminently conservative. Moreover, Mr. Wilson is an admirable photographer, and the photographs not only embellish the volume, but are sometimes a suggestive commentary on the text."—Saturday Review.

"There is a twofold charm in this volume; first, that of a well-written narrative of adventures in a country replete with interesting associations; and secondly, the profusion of illustrations from photographs. The publishers have got up the work in the daintiest style, and, taken all in all, 'In Scripture Lands' is a valuable and delightful volume."—British Journal of Photography.

"Altogether, the book, which is very sumptuously got up, will not only be of value to the inexperienced traveller in the East, but will prove eminently helpful to all students of E. Writ."—Toll Mall Gazette.

"A notable volume in every respect, and an ideal gift in summer or in winter."—Express Times.

"The work has so many independent qualities as to take a place of its own, and contains material of no small value. Many of the illustrations reproduce places not to be met with in the ordinary books of reference, and in all of them the choice of the point of view helps to the impressiveness of the scenes themselves."—Scotsman.

"The volume is sufficiently handsome to adorn any drawing-room table, but at the same time it possesses such intrinsic value for the Bible student, that it might well be added to the library of every one who has charge of a senior Bible class."—Review of the Churches.

UNITED STATES PICTURES.

Drawn with Pen and Pencil. By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "Norwegian Pictures," "London Pictures," &c. With a Map and 165 Engravings, imperial 8vo, 8s., handsome cloth, gilt edges.

"Whether for a table-book or for perusal in the library, no one who possesses it will find it otherwise than a delightful book."—Times Weekly.

"The engravings with which the book is studded are admirable."—Spectator.

"The text is pleasantly written, and the woodcuts are always graphic, the whole forming an excellent introduction to the varied characteristics of American life and scenery."—Globe.

"A reliable guide-book and illustrated souvenir in one."—Toll Mall Gazette.

"It is an exceedingly interesting volume."—Church Times.

"Mr. Lovett is informing but never wearisome, chatty but not garrulous, skillfully descriptive without ostentation or pretentiousness. It is a fascinating book in which the pictures rival the letterpress."—Record.

"These little Maps of the starry spaces far surpass, in clearness and useful worth, all I have seen before in the planisphere way; no reader but by help of them may find, with a minimum of trouble, the star he seeks. . . . Why did not somebody teach me the constellations, too, and make me at home in the starry heavens, which are always overhead, and which I don't half-know to this day!"—THOMAS CARLYLE (referring to the first edition of this book).

WALKS in PALESTINE. The Letterpress by Henry A. Harper, Author of "Illustrated Letters to my Children from the Holy Land," &c. Illustrated by 21 Photogravures from Photographs taken by C. V. Shadbolt, Esq. Royal 4to, 25s., bevelled boards, gilt edges.

This volume forms a superb gift-book and souvenir of the Holy Land. Mr. Shadbolt's photographs are of the highest merit, and they have been most beautifully produced by Messrs. Annan and Swan. The letterpress is from the pen of Mr. Harper, who has lived in Palestine, and is familiar with every spot shown in the illustrations.

VICTORIA, R.I.: her Life and Reign. By Dr. Macaulay. Author of "Sea Pictures," "The Speeches of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales," "Lytic Anecdotes," "Gordon Anecdotes," &c. With 5 Portraits of the Queen, and 61 Engravings by E. Whympster and others. Price 10s. 6d., in handsome cloth, gilt edges.

"It is a beautifully printed and very prettily illustrated volume, and is admirable in taste and feeling."—Illustration.

"The author's endeavour has been to recall those qualities in the personal character of the Queen, and the incidents in her life, which have most endeared her to her people."—Times.

"A very acceptable gift-book."—Stamford Mercury.

The BOOK OF PSALMS. According to the Authorised VERSION. Metrically arranged, with Introductions, various Renderings, Explanatory Notes, and Index, Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth boards, red edges.

"The best English reader's handbook for the study of the Psalms yet published."—Expository Times.

"The introduction is a learned essay on the Psalms, which the student will read with great interest, and the notes are elaborate and scholarly."—Scotsman.

"We heartily commend it to the notice of Bible readers."—English Churchman.

"The book will prove helpful to students, as well as suggestive to those who read the Psalms as a devotional exercise."—Christian.

"We do not know any edition of the Psalter which, for popular use, can be put alongside of this."—N. B. Daily Mail.

GEORGE KENNAN'S SIBERIA.

SIBERIA and the EXILE SYSTEM. By George Kennan.

Elaborately illustrated. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, uncut edges and gilt tops, 32s.

"Both in his narrative and in his pictures, Mr. Kennan depicts life in Siberia and characteristic episodes of the exile system with a masterly hand."—Daily News.

COUNT VON MOLTKE'S LETTERS.

LETTERS of FIELD-MARSHALL COUNT HELMUTH VON

MOLTKE to his MOTHER and his BROTHERS ADOLF and LUDWIG (1823-1888). With Illustrations. Translated by CLARA BELL and HENRY W. FISCHER. Two Vols, demy 8vo, cloth extra, 21s.

The Times says:—"We take leave of this most readable volume with regret, and we have no hesitation in recommending it to all who take an interest in literature of this kind."

CHAUCER'S LIFE AND WRITINGS.

STUDIES in CHAUCER: his Life and Writings. By Professor

THOMAS R. LOUNSBURY. With a Portrait of Chaucer. In Three Vols., 8vo, cloth extra, 42s.

Professor Lounsbury's "Studies" fill three large and attractive volumes, and cover almost every problem which has been connected with the name of Chaucer, while giving their fullest attention to the questions which lie in the way of true intellectual communion with the poet.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD'S BOOK ON JAPAN.

JAPONICA. By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

With Illustrations by Robert Blum. 8vo, cloth, ornamental, 15s.

Sir Edwin Arnold's picture of Japan, its people and their ways and thoughts, is as delicate in texture as it is poetic in colour and sympathetic in tone.

AMELIA B. EDWARDS'S NEW BOOK.

PHARAOHS, FELLAHS, and EXPLORERS. By AMELIA B.

EDWARDS, Author of "A Thousand Miles up the Nile," "Lord Brackenbury," "Barbara's History." Profusely illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth, ornamental, 18s.

"Readers who, without being professed Egyptologists, are fascinated by a subject which never relaxes its hold on those who have once yielded to its spell, cannot but be grateful to Miss Edwards for summarising the results of the most recent inquiries and discoveries in a form at once popular, attractive and adequate. The work is copiously illustrated from various authentic sources."—Times.

"The Penny Post," an old and trusted friend, continues its wholesome work."—Church Times.

A really wonderful pennyworth."—Church Review.

"The Penny Post" excels itself this month. Innumerable are the good things for which Churchmen are indebted to this magazine, which we may well call the oldest and most popular of Church miscellanies."—Church Review.

"The Penny Post" is a sound Church magazine, cheap and readable, and in strong contrast to the many undenominational, wishy-washy publications circulated amongst our Churchpeople by clergymen of the 'safe' school."—Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette.

"This favourite periodical well fulfils its title as a magazine for all readers."—English Churchman.

FROM WARD & DOWNEY'S LIST.

MEMOIRS of RICHARD ROBERT MADDEN. Edited by his son, T. M. MADDEN, Esq. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"His visits to many climes and cities of men of literary tastes, and his friendship with Lady Blessington, Count d'Orsay, and a host of other celebrities furnish abundant material for a fascinating biography."—Times.

ENGLAND and the ENGLISH in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By W. C. SYDNEY. Two vols., demy 8vo, 21s.

"The studies on Fleet marriages, on quacks, and on King Mob are perhaps the most notable for new matter, but the whole book is very well worth reading."—National Observer.

TWO YEARS amongst the SAVAGES of NEW GUINEA. With an Introductory Chapter on North Queensland. By W. D. PITCAIRN, F.R.S. One vol., crown 8vo, 5s.

"This is a capital work of travel. It records in an unpretentious fashion the experience of a couple of years on the coast of New Guinea and the neighbouring islands. It narrates some thrilling adventures by sea and land, and the author, without having much literary polish, has a happy knack of telling his story clearly and dramatically."—Morning Post.

NOTES on MEN, WOMEN, and BOOKS. By LADY WILDE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"They are acute and lively."—St. James's Gazette.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL STUDIES

By A. W. BUCKLAND, Member of the Anthropological Institute. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

A BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

The LITTLE LADY of LAVENDER THEODORA ELMSLIE. Illustrated by Edith Seaton. 3s. 6d.

"It is one of the best stories intended for, or at least about, children that have appeared since 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.'"—Academy.

"The illustrations to the book are charming, and the moral of the story is excellent."—The Speaker.

THREE ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

PICTURESQUE LONDON. By Percy FITZGERALD. With upwards of 100 Illustrations. 2s.

"We are delighted to get a book like 'Picturesque London,' itself a triumph of the printer's art."—St. James's Gazette.

"It is all about the curiosities of London, the quaint houses, and the odds and ends of archaeology and lore."—Daily News.

SOCIAL ENGLAND under the REGENCY. By JOHN ASHTON. Illustrated by reproductions of contemporary Sketches. 2 vols. 3s. 8vo, 30s.

"Bright and pleasant reading. . . One of the merits of the two volumes is that they reproduce in excellent style a large number of contemporary caricatures of Gilray, Rowlandson, Cruikshank, and others."—Times.

MEMOIRS of the MONTHS. By HUME NISBET. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Twelve whole-page and numerous smaller Illustrations by the Author. Edition limited to 250 copies. 21s.

"We have before us a beautiful gift-book in Mr. H. Nisbet's 'Memoirs of the Months.'"—Graphic.

 In January will be published, in two royal 8vo, containing about 900 pp. and numerous illustrations, at £2 2s., "GOSSIP OF THE CENTURY," Author of "Flemish Interiors." This work is a series of personal and traditional memories—social, literary and artistic.

The Ancient Laws of Wales,

DRAWN ESPECIALLY IN REGARD TO THE LIGHT THEY THROW UPON THE ORIGIN OF SOME ENGLISH INSTITUTIONS.

y the late HUBERT LEWIS, B.A., of the Middle Temple, formerly Scholar of Emmanuel College, Camb. Author of Principles of Conveyancing, Principles of Equity Drafting, and Editor of Goldsmith's Equity. Edited, with a preface by J. E. LLOYD, M.A., Lecturer in History and Welsh at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth.

"The work before us displays everywhere the unmistakable marks of profound scholarship and of careful investigation. Good and copious index, highly necessary to such a work, has been added, and altogether this volume may be pronounced to be a treasury of information on the subject of old Welsh institutions. It is, moreover, clearly written, and it is throughout invested with great interest, and many of the very curious family customs of ancient Wales are here set forth in a manner which is decidedly attractive."

SECOND EDITION (Revised) now ready. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Some Poets of the People in Foreign Lands.

By J. W. CROMBIE.

"There are few works in English that explain in so delightful a way the beauties of foreign popular poetry."

"The volume is fresh and scholarly and holds the attention to the last page, which we finish with regret. It is tastefully and substantially got up."

"This interesting and daintily written little volume Mr. Crombie writes so delightfully that his volume as pleasant as it is full of information."

Daydawn, Consolation, and other Poems.

By J. MELLOR.

"These poems have a frankness and sincerity of feeling that is better a thousand times than the affectations of superiority that beset most modern minor poetry; and the book will please that large number of readers who take interest in a new expression of familiar truth."

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

Weeds from a Wild Garden.

These better deserve the name of 'flowers' than most of the verses which strew our path. Here there is pathos, art, scenery, point, and somewhat of the true minstrel's music."

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. post free.

Old England's Navy.

An Epic of the Sea. By CHARLES RATHBONE LOW, F.R.G.S., Lieutenant Indian Navy.

THE OXFORD SHAKESPEARE.

BEING THE COMPLETE WORKS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

Edited, with a Glossary, by

W. J. CRAIG, M.A.

TWO EDITIONS.

The Edition on OXFORD INDIA PAPER combines in a remarkable way clearness and legibility of type with great portability and lightness. The volume contains 1,272 pages of tough, opaque paper, yet it measures no more than seven-eighths of an inch in thickness, and weighs barely nineteen ounces. It is printed in leaded Emerald type.

"THE OXFORD SHAKESPEARE will certainly take a high rank among single-volume editions. The type is admirably clear, and the general appearance of the volume is highly attractive. The edition on India paper is quite a gem."—Times.

"The evidences of careful scholarship in Mr. Craig's admirable edition are very numerous, and the text has been most judiciously treated."—Morning Post.

"It is in every sense marvellous; it is unique. Thanks to India paper and special type the text is not only clear, but it is a positive eye-delight to peruse it."—Manchester Examiner.

"No finer single-volume edition of Shakespeare has ever been issued."—North British Daily Mail.

LITERATURE.

History of the French Revolution. By H. Morse Stephens. Second Volume. (Longmans)

THE editor of the ACADEMY has reminded me of the promise to review this volume, which I made after noticing its predecessor so long ago as June 26, 1886. In the interval that volume has been frequently in my hands, and in those of several friends engaged in advanced historical teaching, with the result that on turning over my former review I find no word of praise to retract; nay, rather a few hasty animadversions to tone down or withdraw. For instance, as to the insertion into the text of a short biography of each personage as he appears on the scene. I must own that others, especially French critics, have strongly approved the method. No doubt it does lend life to the narrative, but I still think it interrupts it, and should have preferred long footnotes, though not blind to the reasons which have confined the present notes to references and authorities. I must also own that the corrected spelling of "Foullon" is quite right. There was, indeed, the greatest laxity of signatures from 1789 to about 1795. Patriots adopted and changed various noms de fantaisie, and spelt them as they would, or could; some quite superior patriots even seem to have varied their signature from time to time for variety's sake, as befitted the Natural Man. Mr. Stephens has probably relied (as do the latest French authorities) upon the forms used in the official lists of the various Assemblies. He, however, still clings to the form Sicýs, like most English writers; the proper reading is Sieyès, pronounced "See-ess." The difficulties which appear to have delayed this volume have left their mark on the style which, especially in the earlier chapters, would bear more revision. One finds a few needless repetitions, a few obscure sentences, and a few rather conventional reflections. However, with these occasional lapses, it is clear, and even at times rises to unaffected eloquence, as in the perorations of chaps. x. and xiii., and is frequently enlivened with terse and felicitous sayings. I still think the chapters should have been shorter or else subdivided; for instance, the last comprises two perfectly distinct subjects, the colonies and the émigrés. The tone is that of the dignified historian who never stoops to irony, much less a joke; a reprobate mind, alas, when it reflects upon the stores of fun the author must have come across in his researches, cannot help sighing for the time when a great Comic History of the Revolution shall appear.

The period from October, 1791, to the end of 1793, is treated in this volume, the Legislative Assembly occupying the first four chapters, which require little comment, because no fresh light is thrown upon events already so carefully examined and repeatedly described. Here the author has not followed up his long narrative of the Varennes affair, but sagaciously confines himself to the briefest notice of the famous dramatic scenes and personal episodes—the storming of the Tuileries, the royal family in the Assembly, at the Feuillants, at the Temple, at their trials at the scaffold, and so forth—on which other pens have run riot. He opens with a useful analysis of the Legislative Assembly, laying stress on the absence of a central party like that of the Constituent and, we might add, of the Convention also. He points out the extreme youth of the leading men—de Préménéu alone was over forty, that they were mostly new local men; and (what is usually neglected) that in spite of its phalanx of savants, lawyers, and local wire-pullers, the Second Assembly was still more incompetent, helpless, loquacious, and logically illogical than the First. French logic was still as triumphant as in the palmy days when Rabaut Saint-Étienne was allowed to have demolished the idea of a Second Chamber by his dictum, "La nation est une, en conséquence sa représentation doit être une," no one apparently remarking that this meant either that the Assembly should consist of a single member, or else nothing at all. No space is wasted on the stock quotations from the windy eloquence of the beaux parleurs. In an Appendix Mr. Stephens makes an elaborate analysis—never before attempted on so comprehensive a plan—of the subdivisions and individual members of the Girondin faction; he proves how they forced on the fatal war in spite of Jacobin opposition, and gives them their due place in the history. But it is a small one. And rightly; for after all they were powerful only for mischief, a sorry flock of self-deluded bell-wethers, sadly confused by their own rival tinkling, butting and prancing in valiant disorder down the lane which ended in the butcher's shop. Though they captured the Legislative and the Convention, they never really governed at all, but let power slip first to the Sections and afterwards to the Committees; they did nothing whatever for France or the world, have left nothing behind; from first to last they were in a wholly false position, like their divinity Manon Roland throned between her paramour Buzot and her "virtuous" spouse. A correct and most useful plan of the environs of the Tuileries is given; a still more valuable novelty would be a fair-sized map of the whole of Paris as it then was. The war is quite sufficiently treated, but at no great length. Its details are for European or strictly military history, but Mr. Stephen's carefully traces its direct influence on the fortunes of the Revolution. In fact, he makes it the key of the position, the Twentieth of June being caused by the first defeats, the Tenth of August by Brunswick's Manifesto, and the September massacres by the Prussian advance. In calling Mallet du Pan the "accredited envoy of the Tuileries," he might have mentioned the autograph letter which Bertrand de Molleville had obtained from the king and forwarded to Frankfurt in the boot-heel of various couriers, for this leaves with Louis the credit of the last effort at a constitutional compromise. The Manifesto was entirely the work of the Princes' gang—the wise-aces who positively when they invaded France issued orders that the French army and people, who would, of course, rush to fraternise with the émigrés, were to be sternly repulsed as rebels.

Chapters v. to viii. deal with the Convention down to the Fall of the Girondins. The parallel progress of the war and of the anarchy are steadily kept in view, and the inverse action of decaying democracy and rising oligarchy. Danton, like Mirabeau in 1791, keeps shouting down the chattering and demanding a strong executive; but to such a pass had things come that nothing was strong enough short of tyranny and terror. This was the conviction not only of the Montagne, but unconsciously of the nation; hence the pitiless extermination of the Girondins, hence the crusade against La Vendée, hence the tyrannical suppression of Federalism at Lyons and elsewhere. Federalism might be all very well in its way, but France was sick of political theories, it just wanted somebody to look after the war and keep out the émigrés, therefore all these meddlers were voted unpatriotic. And so there was an end of them.

This brings us to what is the most remarkable chapter in the book, that on the Revolutionary Government, followed by those on the Terror. Already our author has carefully traced the tendency of the Convention to delegate everything to numerous committees, which become more and more dominated by the two great Committees. The precise steps in the gradual development of the great Committee of Public Safety, and of the instruments of its rule of Terror, the Committee of General Security, the Revolutionary Tribunal, and the Missions, have never before been clearly traced for English readers. Yet nothing can be more important. These are exhaustively and yet concisely treated in the Appendices, all of which indeed are models of laborious compilation from the latest authorities. On them I must dwell a moment. Appendix V. institutes an interesting comparison of the abortive Constitution of '93 and Condorcet's scheme; VI. gives full lists of the members of the twenty-one committees at the opening of 1793, as they appear in Goussin's report at that date; VII. and VIII. trace the development and intricate changes in the personnel of the two great Committees; X. gives lists of the deputies sent on the four chief missions with their destinations. These last have been drawn up by Mr. Stephens from scattered notices in various authorities, especially from M. Wallon's great work completed last year, the most important list, that of the 9th Nivose, 1793, being here for the first time printed from the original document in the archives. With the help of these compilations and others which are promised in due course, the student at last begins to see his way among the chaos of names, names, names in the histories. Appendix IX. is also original research. It arranges under each month, from April, 1793, to June 10, 1794 (where for the present it stops), the number of executions by the Revolutionary Tribunal, with the names of the principal victims, thus enabling us to estimate the growing severity of the Terror and its reflex action on the course of political events. XI. gives the various armies of the Republic, with lists of their ever-changing generals, and of the deputies' on mission with them. Lastly, we have a tabular guide to the diabolical Revolutionary Calendar.

The chapter on the Terror in Paris—that sinister government resting on the Revolutionary Committees, with their cartes de sûreté, their denunciations and the loi des suspects, upon the bribed Sans-culotte army, and upon the Law of the Maximum—in short upon ruffianism and out-door relief—this chapter calls for no separate notice, but the next on the Terror in the provinces is most important. In only eighty pages it skims the cream of the innumerable local histories which keep appearing in France, mostly by competent hands, and which are gradually reducing legend to history. Every student should read two or three of them at least: they have the fascination of tangible fact; they present in a miniature the revolutionary picture which on a vast canvas no eye can take in; they, and they alone, show us how through that whirlwind of big words, and big ideas, and big crimes, men lived their little sordid, comfortable lives, and the world managed somehow to wag on in its old unrevolutionary revolution. In short, it is in such pages that I would seek the profounder lessons of that didactic period rather than in political documents or philosophical histories. That Mr. Stephens has read them all is impossible; but that he has referred at first hand to them, guided in his search, no doubt, by such authorities as Berriat St. Prix's Justice révolutionnaire dans les Provinces, Wallon's Représentants en Mission, and the earlier volumes of the complete publication of the official correspondence, &c., of the Committee of Public Safety, which M. Aulard is editing for the Government—of this I have sufficiently satisfied myself.

What, then, is the author's attitude towards the Terror? Only rarely does he permit himself in passing to comment on events and men, and then I not unfrequently wish that he had refrained; but to his main teaching I must own myself an unwilling convert. It is that from the first to the last there were men of a practical turn who cared little for forms of government, but very much for government itself: that these men did all the governing that was done: that this feeling was intensified in the collapse of '92: that by an inevitable process of natural selection power passed from the lazy, talkative Girondins of the Convention to the twelve men of action on the Great Committee who, in scorn of the division de pouvoirs fallacy, became the real practical ministers of State. And who were those men? Mr. Stephens tells us. From his admirable studies of their antecedents we gather that, though all but the courtier De Séchelles were of good bourgeois families, and all well educated men, none, not even Carnot, were highly gifted or specially trained administrators. Till the Revolution, all but Robespierre and Carnot had been strangers to one another. Seven were avocats, ten were provincials, only two Parisians. Three—at most four—were orators. The real committee was the seven silent working members with their reporter Barrère. For though we always regard Robespierre as the head and spring of the government, Mr. Stephens insists that he and his satellites, Couthon and Saint Just, were only figure heads, were always in an outvoted minority, and when they at last pushed their theoretical nonsense too far, were got rid of as a nuisance. Such then were the men who had greatness thrust upon them. What their motives were, who knows? Who need care? What time had they to think about motives? They found themselves thrust into a dark, quiet corner, apart from the strutting stage-politicians, where hard work was to be done, and they simply fell to. Right or wrong! morals and humanity! beautiful Rousseau sentiment! all very well for the tribune, but only a waste of time at their hurried nightly conferences at the Pavillon de l'Egalité. The country was in danger—it had to be saved from foe and anarchy—and they meant to do it. And how? By that supremely wicked, but supremely politic and patriotic, engine we call the Terror. Deliberately from the first they planned this cool, ruthless, conscienceless tyranny to bear down the faintest shudder of opposition. And they planned it well. It ruled triumphant; it lasted unshaken till the need for it had passed, and France cowered for a while contentedly under the heel of these parvenus, and ever since has condoned their crimes, simply because they wrought her will and took upon themselves her sins for her salvation. The Terror was a political tour de force unparalleled in history. It saved France from undying ridicule; it robbed the world of a final warning of that natural law which must ever make artificial democracy a piteous failure till men are other than they are. France till now has never been governed by a democracy, has never been a republic at all, but ever has been managed by some oligarchy or other. As the Venetian republic rose to its height under the Council of Ten, so the One and Indivisible flourished only as a screen for the hole-and-corner tyranny of a dozen commonplace Neroes. And further, be it remembered that the twenty thousand victims of the Terror were but the propitiatory sacrifice for the multitudes that would have fallen had the Terror not been.

To some such conclusions as these I think most readers, however prejudiced, will be reduced who study Mr. Stephens's far more lucid train of argument. But here I part company with him; for now and then, in his anxiety to present the bare facts free from the incrustations which hysterical writers have formed round them, he seems to be by a clause here and there, by a word or an epithet, to palliate or extenuate the crimes of his heroes. This may be no doubt is—a generous protest against a century of sweeping invective, but it is wrong all the same. Politically we may admire and approve the Terror—who can help? Morally it was atrocious. That its authors ever rose to the ethical pinnacle of deliberately offering up their consciences and their hopes of salvation upon the altar of the country I do not believe; but even if they did, it does not alter the intrinsic immorality of their acts. The bloodshed was not the worst—what was it compared to Gravelotte? It was the lies, the treachery, the spying, the delation, the fraud, the mean and dirty tricks, the daily spectacle of audacious rapacity and impudence triumphant over merit: of what is base and ugly throttling what is most lovely and venerable; above all, the gigantic hypocrisy of a whole nation by its yells trying to convince itself and others that it was the New Model of Freedom, while it was at once both Tyrant and Slave as never nation was before. Throughout that strange epoch I search in vain for one faint whisper of the sacred right of conscience as it dwells in the breast of Swiss or English peasant—for one single manly voice raised in the name of the toleration which irradiates the pages of Voltaire and of Milton. The great, warm, generous throbbing heart of France, once seared and paralysed by the brand of the national hypocrisy, is not yet whole—will ever be?—a nation of sham ideals, of cynical half-beliefs, of mutual suspicions, of brooding jealousies, haunted by dread of ridicule, torn by impotent anger—such indelible traces does the Goddess of Liberty still bear of her childhood of Terror.

On the army Mr. Stephens has nothing fresh to say; but as to the navy, he has collected much new and interesting matter, especially as to the reforms of Jean-Baptiste St. André. In his last chapter he resumes the thread of colonial history. Here his matter is mainly new, much of it not having been hitherto printed, even in France; and his treatment is as sagacious as comprehensive. Of the Indian part an interesting study has appeared in the Times in one of its reviews of Indian affairs. Nor are the pages on the West Indies less novel and important. He closes with a clear and striking sketch of the Emigration, marred by one error of judgment, the insertion of the common anecdote about the Duke of Bridgewater given by M. d'Haussonville in his charming Vie de mon Père. The story is so monstrously improbable, that I have not troubled even to seek from what misunderstanding it arose; but regard it as a mere lie. Mr. Stephens would have found far better instances of English charity in a letter written in 1793 by the Bishop of St. Pol: for instance, how when two poor priests turned despondently away from bargaining for a fish, the ragged fishwife asked after them to force it on them gratis; still better, how when the bishop was waiting in London, he felt something thrust into his hand; it was a penny, and turning round he saw a poor milkman hurrying away.

ashamed of the smallness of his mite. In another place (p. 36) Mr. Stephens shows an equal want of scepticism in accepting the story that the South German princes erected gallows along their frontiers with the notice "Il est défendu aux émigrés et aux vagabonds de passer outre." The tale is absurd on the face of it and not worth testing. It was started in Tilly's Memoirs, and every writer since keeps repeating it; M. Bardoux even speculates whether the object was not rather to keep out the contagion of the Constitutional refugees.

The volume must not be judged from this slight and inadequate sketch. It should be read and read carefully; nor will any true student close it without a wish that the author may be enabled before long to complete so invaluable, so solid, so creditable a contribution to our historical literature.

E. PURCELL.

The Study of English Literature. By John Churton Collins. (Macmillans.)

In this small volume Mr. Churton Collins renews his attack on the policy pursued by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge towards the study of English literature. In articles contributed to the Quarterly and other reviews and periodicals, he has already touched on most of the points here presented; but it is convenient to have in a permanent form the arguments on which he and his friends rely. That these arguments are likely to convert philologists, who consider that there is nothing to learn and nothing to teach in English literature except words, is very unlikely; but they will strengthen the hands of the practical teachers who are urging on the authorities of those Universities the doctrine that the greatest literature in the world should not be neglected simply because it is our own, and because every cultivated person has necessarily some casual and superficial acquaintance with it.

The author has two main theses—(1) that English literature deserves to be studied as literature at the Universities; and (2) that this study can only be satisfactorily conducted in close connexion with that of classical and foreign literature. Incidentally he asserts that the study of the classics is in this country too much occupied with their historical, archaeological, and philological aspects, and that too little attention is paid to the contents and structure of the classical works themselves. He points out that the need for systematic training in English literature is recognised everywhere but at Oxford and Cambridge. In every other country in the world English literature is thought worthy of study not only from the point of view of the philologist but as literature. The universities of America, Ireland, and Scotland, and the other universities of England teach it or examine in it. In our better boys' schools, except those which are hopelessly abandoned to scholarship-hunting, some regard is paid to it; while it forms one of the most important features in all good girls' schools. The University Extension Organisation alone insures a demand for adequate teachers far in excess of the supply. Ordinary students see that to understand and enjoy great works of literary art, whether in their own language or not, they require a special training, and that this training can only be adequately given by teachers who have themselves been specially trained. In spite of the present craze for natural science, the lectures of such men as Mr. Moulton and Mr. Collins himself have been among the best attended and most fruitful courses provided by the Extension system. Nevertheless, the two great Universities practically refuse to acknowledge their responsibilities. It has been pointed out, says Mr. Collins,

"that if Literature as a subject of teaching is to effect for popular culture what it is of power to effect; if, as an instrument of political education, it is to warn, to admonish, to guide; if, as an instrument of moral and aesthetic education, it is to exercise that influence on taste, on tone, on sentiment, on opinion, on character, on all, in fine, which is susceptible of educational impression, it must first hold that place in the training of its modern exponents which it held in that [sic] of the training of its exponents in ancient times; that it must be rescued from its present degrading vassalage to philology, that its profession must not be regarded as the common property and makeshift of any graduate in any faculty whom accident may turn to it" (pp. 4-5).

The teacher of English literature has first to educate himself, as Mr. Moulton told the London University Extension meeting at Gresham College the other day. Oxford and Cambridge will have nothing to do with his education, though they guarantee his proficiency.

I cannot enter into the merits of the pretty quarrel at Oxford as to the first appointment to the chair of English Literature. It was disheartening enough to see such an opportunity lost; but at Cambridge we have little to boast of in the way of direct encouragement to belles lettres: we have been, and still are, frankly philological. Our Modern and Mediaeval Tripos does not pretend to regard literature in any other light than as a convenient exercising ground for the student of words. Our interest in it ceases with Pope and Addison; because after the beginning of the eighteenth century the linguistic archaeologist finds little to glean. "Real solid study of books" with us, as apparently with Mr. E. A. Freeman, does not involve any consideration of the books as works of literary art. We hoped for better things at Oxford, where it was believed, rightly or wrongly, that a wider tradition obtained, until the appointment of Mr. Napier showed that the philologists had entirely captured the literary schools.

The real issue to be decided is this. Can literature be studied and taught? And if so, is it worth studying? In all other arts the possibility, and the need, of a scientific analysis of form and matter is acknowledged. We can, in the case of painting or architecture, or music, analyse the form of any given work, and trace the origin and development of that form; we can attempt to explain its aesthetic effect and justify its employment on psychological grounds. And we know that this analysis does not diminish, indeed, largely increases, our enjoyment of the work. Is such a process impossible with reference to a play or a poem? If not, is it here so easy and obvious that it requires no study and no training? To examine merely the words is to act like a student of architecture, who in a great cathedral refuses to attend to plan, or mouldings, or tracery, but concentrates his mind exclusively on the chemical and mineralogical characteristics of the stone of which the church is built. This is the attitude encouraged by the Mediaeval and Modern Languages Tripos, by the local examinations conducted by Oxford and Cambridge, and by the pet editions of Shakspeare prescribed.

It cannot be said that Mr. Churton Collins overlooks the importance of the study of language as a necessary preliminary to the purely literary analysis. While in his heart of hearts he perhaps regards a philologist much as Sir William Hamilton regarded a mathematician, he speaks with perfect justness of the relations between Philology and Literature.

"The proper place of Philology in its higher phases . . . is with the sciences. So far as it is related to Literature, it is related merely as grammar, it is related as the drudge is related to his master, as the key of the jewel-casket is related to the treasure it unlocks" (p. 66).

What he protests against is the theory, fostered by the Clarendon Press Shaksperes and Miltons, that the interest of a poem ends when its language is completely understood.

In Chapter V. the necessity for associating the study of English literature with that of ancient classical literature is strongly enforced, and supported by the authority of Prof. Jowett, Mr. Pater, Matthew Arnold, Mr. John Morley, and other qualified judges. With this opinion it is only the ultra-Teutonic party who will seriously disagree. The classical literatures, together with the derivative romance literatures, have given us all our literary forms, and nearly all our literary material. Even our metrical system itself is due to them. The structure of our dramas, epics, lyrics, novels, essays, and histories, can be directly or indirectly traced to Greek prototypes. Our plots, our dramatic situations, our metaphors and similes, our commonplaces of criticism, are nearly all imported from classical, romance, or biblical sources. As I understand Mr. Collins, while he would regard Greek and Latin, French and early Italian literature as a necessary preparation for the study of English literature, he would not wish to discourage a study of the Anglo-Saxon and Middle English writers. Poor and contemptible as most of it is, their work can scarcely be neglected by those who wish to form a complete idea of the literary capacities and tendencies of the race. What he regards as unnecessary seems to be a "scientific knowledge" of Anglo-Saxon. He is above all things anxious to insist on the continuity of classical and modern literature, an idea which one might have thought would not be without charm for the Oxford Historical School.

For the details of Mr. Collins' scheme of a School of Literature at Oxford, the reader must be referred to the volume itself. He shows that such a scheme is perfectly feasible; and to prove that satisfactory papers can be set in literature, he gives some specimens by way of appendix. If examiners do not know how to tackle the subject, so much the worse for the examiners. Literature papers, it is said by philologists, must lead to cramming. Every teacher knows that any subject may be crammed, if the examiners choose to set papers which make cramming a paying proceeding. Even in philosophy appeal can be made exclusively to the memory of the candidate, as the farcical papers which used to be, and for aught I know still are, set at Trinity College, Dublin, admirably show. But that literature labours under any special disqualification is absolutely unproved.

In view of the Greek vote at Cambridge the other day, the following admirable words seem to me to deserve quotation:

"Classical literature can never, it is true, become extinct; but it can lose its vogue, it can become the almost exclusive possession of mere scholars, it can cease to be influential. Every step in the progress of its alienation from life is a step in the progress of its decline. Philology cannot save it, technical scholarship cannot save it. It must be linked with life to live, with the incarnation of that of which it too is the incarnation, to prevail. . . . In pleading for the recognition and organisation of the study of English literature on the lines indicated in this book, I have indeed adduced the one unanswerable argument in justification of the classics maintaining in modern times their old leading and dominant position in secondary education" (pp. 146-7).

Perhaps, after all, the country parson who rushes up to Cambridge to vote for the retention of the "Little-go Greek" which he has himself forgotten is not so much the champion of culture as he imagines.

THE DISASTER IN MANIPUR.

My Three Years in Manipur and Escape from the Recent Mutiny. By Ethel St. Clair Grimwood. (Bentley.)

Manipur, compiled from the Columns of the "Pioneer." (Allahabad: Pioneer Press.)

LORD PALMERSTON declared in 1857 that thenceforward it should be praise enough for any man to say of him that he had shown the courage of an Englishwoman. The name of Mrs. Grimwood is now fittingly inscribed in the memorable list of wives and daughters of England who in siege and battle in Eastern lands have borne themselves bravely, nor have faltered in kindly ministrations to the suffering under an enemy's fire. The attack on the Manipur Residency lasted indeed but a few hours, the perils of the retreat to Cachar were over in a few days; yet, even during so brief a space of time, Mrs. Grimwood must have felt the same agony of spirit, much of the same bodily anguish, which so many afflicted women passed through when rebellion, treachery, and slaughter went hand in hand from the centre to the extremities of Hindustan, agony and anguish, alas, which have been the sorrowful lot of more than one Englishwoman since. There is no need, however, to dwell on the terrors of the story of Manipur. They are described by Mrs. Grimwood in a simple, yet impressive, manner; and, unconsciously perhaps, she has heightened the effect of her narrative by recounting her earlier and less painful experiences of life at the Residency, when the quiet monotony of existence was only broken by such pleasant interludes as a water picnic on the beautiful Logtak lake, a week's deer-shooting in the jungle, a garden party at the Residency, or a polo match, where the Senápathi, looking very picturesque in his zouave jacket of green velvet and turban and waistcloth of pink silk, would distinguish himself.

But there are other impressions to be recorded. Although the author studiously avoids casting blame on anyone, her narrative points to the inevitable conclusion that others besides some of those who perished in the palace helped to bring about the catastrophe. It is more than likely that, had the Resident's advice been sought and taken, when a policy of mischievous activity was contemplated, all would have gone well. But Mr. Grimwood was ignored both at Shillong and Calcutta. His local knowledge went for nothing, or next to nothing. Mrs. Grimwood writes:

"About a week before the Chief Commissioner arrived, Mr. Gurdon was sent to see my husband, and talk over matters with him; but even then we were ignorant of what was really intended, and it was only on the day before they all arrived—March 21—that my husband was told all by Mr. Quinton himself, whom he had ridden out ten miles to meet. . . . My husband returned about 7 p.m. from Sengmai, very tired and very much worried at all he had heard. I went into his little private office with him, and there he told me of what was to take place on the morrow."

This is really the key to the breakdown of the Chief Commissioner's policy. Irresolute and distrustful, the Government could not even consult the officer who was in the best position to give sound advice. Unfortunately, it was not the civilians alone who blundered. The military authorities were to blame for the weakness and defective equipment of the escort. Colonel Skene made mistakes which cost him his life. The two officers left in command and second in command after his detention by the enemy made mistakes which have lost them their commissions in the army. In regard to Colonel Skene's errors of judgment it may be mentioned that the Pioneer's special correspondent, who went to Manipur with the avenging force, and whose experience of Asiatic warfare entitles him to speak with authority, goes into this question very thoroughly, and the reader will find his letters well worth studying. Here, however, we must pass on to Mrs. Grimwood's account of the stampede from Manipur. The precise reasons that have induced Sir Frederick Roberts to approve the severe punishment meted out to Capt. Boileau and Butcher are not yet known; but Mrs. Grimwood's story goes a considerable way towards clearing up any doubt on the subject. It is important to notice that, when the Residency proved untenable, the Chief Commissioner and the officer commanding his escort had almost, if not quite, resolved on a retreat to Cachar. "At last" [about 7 p.m.], Mrs. Grimwood writes, "my husband came and told me that we were to leave the Residency and try and find our way back to Cachar." Either this or retirement to the open country would have been the proper course. "In the open," the Pioneer's correspondent remarks, "it is not too much to say that the half battalion of Gurkhas would have fought and won." But this plan was only formed to be given up. The civil and military chiefs went to the palace to treat with the enemy, and were treacherously captured. That should have made the withdrawal of the little force to the open country the only alternative. But instead of deliberate retirement to the open, instead even of an orderly retreat, there was a stampede without even the justification of a pursuit.

"We were not followed from the palace," Mrs. Grimwood writes, "as we had fully expected. Whether they did not know we had escaped, or whether they thought discretion the better part of valour, and preferred remaining behind the shelter of their walls to following after us with hostile intent, I cannot say; but it was fortunate for us."

Mrs. Grimwood protests against the imputation that her helplessness "influenced the officers in their decision to effect a stampede to Cachar." No one who reads her book will impute anything of the kind. As the Gurkhas were being mustered in marching order, an officer ran up to tell her that it was time to leave the Residency. She went with him; but, in the bustle and confusion, they were separated, and Mrs. Grimwood had to find her way as best she might till a friendly bania, a native huckster following the troops, came to her assistance. She was wading across a river when she was overtaken by Dr. Calvert, "who seemed rather astonished at finding me there all alone." Later on, when shots were exchanged with a party of Manipuris—for the Gurkhas still had some ammunition left—it was the friendly bania who again helped her over an awkward bit of ground. Indeed, had it not been for the bania, who deserves to be created a Rai Bahádur, this book most likely would never have been written.

To the story of the disaster and retreat Mrs. Grimwood appends the letter in which Major Grant described his advance to Thobal, and the gallant stand he made there with a handful of stalwart Punjab men (creseat e fluviiis) and stout-hearted little Gurkhas. That brilliant episode is also related, and in more detail, by the Pioneer's correspondent, whose admirable letters indeed form a complete record both of the events which led to the treacherous slaughter of British officers and of the measures taken to exact retribution for the outrage. Mrs. Grimwood's book, one need only add that it could not fail to be read with a feeling of deep sympathy for the author and of admiration of her conduct.

STEPHEN WHEELER.

Dramas in Miniature. By Mathilde Blind.
(Chatto & Windus.)

THIS title—Dramas in Miniature—is scarcely so definite as it is attractive. Does it promise us real condensed drama—brief stories containing plots that a more diffuse writer might be glad to expand into a novel? Does it rather suggest a kind of play-drama—stories of which the plots may be sharply articulated, while yet their interests are mock-heroic? Or, again, is it intended to denote nothing more than dramatic episodes? Taken in this last signification the title is least satisfactory; but such is the construction Miss Blind appears to put upon the name selected for a book of poetry that is nevertheless welcome and delightful.

This is the day of snapshots. The swift, violent deftness of an hour's brushwork from M. Jan Van Beers conveys to a nerve-exhausted public more sensations than Michael Angelo could evoke. The condensed, crackling verve of Mr. Kipling is needed to galvanise smiles into the face of a culture that is weary of the sun. Even the clergymen (centuries too tardy) are beginning to confine themselves to "two minute sermons." It is scarcely surprising that some of our poets should wish to tempt the jaded public with historiettes told in "brief, quivering sentences" of verse. To mention "Dramatic Lyrics" is to raise a standard of judgment that would be fatal to such of these experiments as have lately appeared. Enough, so far as the book before us goes, to say that Miss Blind's "dramas" exhibit genuine story-telling gifts in addition to the fancy that was to be expected from the author. When we put the book down, we eye it respectfully as the worthy work of an earnest, true-hearted, unaffected student of human nature. Most of her readers will, indeed, continue to think that Miss Blind is at her highest in the earlier study of that "Ascent of Man,"

"Where life is life's insatiate grave."

The noble strenuousness of that study does not mark the less profound "dramas" now published. Nor can it be said that any of these new "dramas" excel in power "The Steamster," a short story that appeared in the same covers with "The Ascent of Man." But this is only to repeat, in indirect fashion, one's pleasurable conviction that some of Miss Blind's earlier poetry is of an exceptionally high order.

The new book opens with "The Russian Student's Tale" of a holiday jaunt undertaken by two collegians and two girls. Where the girls were picked up we are left to conjecture. The young men appear to have known little about them. Nevertheless, one of the students was bold enough to lead his partner away to a private interview in a woodland café:

"I ordered supper, took a room
Green-curtained by the tremulous gloom
Of those fraternal poplar trees
Shaking together in the breeze:
My pulse, too, like a poplar tree,
Shook wildly as she smiled at me.
Eye in eye, and hand in hand,
Awoke amid the slumberous land,

I told her all my love that night—
How I had loved her at first sight:
How I was hers, and seemed to be
Her own to all eternity.
And through the splendour of the white
Electrically glowing night,
Wind-wafted from some perfumed dell,
Tumultuously there loudly rose,
Above the Neva's surge and swell,
With amorous ecstasies and throes,
And lyric spasm of wildest wail,
The love-song of the nightingale."

Now the girl's face was one possessing "that pathetic flower-like blue of eyes which, as they looked at you, seemed yet to stab you through and through." Childlike the girl was in many ways, ignorant of life's purposes, full of heart, and the love of that heart given fully already to her student-friend. But she had to confess to him her history—that of a sempstress's poverty, temptation, and ruin.

"She spoke quite simply of things vile,
Of devils with an angel's face;
It seemed the sunshine of her smile
Must purify the foulest place."

The story-teller's moralising on the inevitable farewell that follows this revelation is in the latter-day spirit. The Neva's swell and the nightingale's song throb and murmur the reproaches of nature recurrently throughout the poem, and the whole incident occurs in a novel atmosphere:

"The midnight sun, with phantom glare, Shone on the soundless thoroughfare."

"The Mystic's Vision" (in this case, again, a question arises regarding the logic of a title) describes the mingled agony and ecstasy of a nun lying "with body lulled and soul awake," and awaiting the incommunicably sweet breathings of Christ's presence. "The Message" is a hospital tale of a harlot's death-bed. The woman withstands all offers of ghostly or secular comfort, until the advent of a deaf girl, who carries flowers round the wards, and innocently offers pure May blossoms to the patient, in spite of her imprecations. The orthodox revulsion of feeling takes place. The woman dies in a dream of home:

"The perfume of the breath of May
Had passed into her soul."

Mr. Ford Madox Brown has illustrated these lines in a frontispiece to the volume.

"The Battle of Flowers" gives us a contrasting picture of the courtesan triumphant, as she drives along the Quai Anglais at Nice.

"Triumphant—without shame or fear—
You air a thousand graces:
Though women turn, when you appear,
With cold averted faces:
Though men at sight of you will stop,
As if they looked into a shop;
Shall both for this not doubly pay?
Jeanne Ray! Jeanne Ray!"

How intense is the cruel truth of description in the felicitously simple lines italicised!

The best "drama" in the volume is "The Song of the Willi." Hungarian legend has it, that the spirits of young affianced girls who die before marriage cannot rest in the grave. These spirits are called "Willi." They nightly haunt the heaths that skirt the villages where their lovers dwell, and if they succeed in attracting them by their alluring cries, they dance them to death. This gusty rhythm is excellently adapted to the theme:

"The wild wind is whistling o'er moorland and heather,
Heigh-ho, heigh-ho!
I rise from my bed, and my bed has no feather, Heigh-ho!"

Appended to the "dramas" are some lyrics (principally of love), which rather too closely repeat the note of despondency that Miss Blind's fancy has affected in other of her volumes. The strong sonnet-like couple of sestets entitled "Love's Somnambulist" show this note almost at its fullest:—

"Like some wild sleeper who alone at night
Walks with unseeing eyes along a height,
With death below and only stars above;
I, in broad daylight, walk as if in sleep,
Along the edges of life's perilous steep,
The lost somnambulist of love.

"I, in broad day, go walking in a dream,
Led on in safety by the starry gleam
Of thy blue eyes that hold my heart in thrall;
Let no one wake me rudely, lest one day,
Startled to find how far I've gone astray,
I dash my life out in my fall."

Of these fine lines, the first six are specially noticeable for that calm, irresistible growth of one simply appropriate word upon another, which marks the clearest expression of poetic thought. This is Arnold's "note of the inevitable."

Turning again the leaves of this book, we cull, as an example of the poet's imagination clothed in unassuming language, the description of the child Marie's death:

"Upon the night Christ saw the light,
She passed away,
As snow will when the sun shines bright."

In "Viola d'Amore" we have a phrase that in its sunny sarcasm seems to fit peculiarly the epoch dealt with:

"Faint glowing fresh from Watteau's art,
Well worth a marchioness's heart."

There is but a single fault one is fain to find in Miss Blind's work, and that is a tendency to vex with commonplace colloquialisms at important points of the stories. Take these passages from "The Message":

"Was she a wicked girl? What then?
She didn't care a pin."

"Our blazing nights turned daylight pale, Champagne would fizz like ginger ale."

Similarly, our extract from the "Student's Tale" commences:

"I ordered supper, took a room."

These commonplaces of phrase are as unwelcome in serious poetry as they are provocative of surprised delight in playful verse, like Calverley's "Tobacco":

"Thou who, when fears attack,
Bidd'st them avaunt, and black
Care, at the horseman's back
Perching unseatest!
Sweet, when the morn is grey:
Sweet, when they've cleared away
Lunch —"

NEW NOVELS.

The Little Minister. By J. M. Barrie. In 3 vols. (Cassells.)

Vain Fortune. By George Moore. (Henry.)

A Rude Awakening. By Mrs. A. Phillips. In 3 vols. (Trischler.)

The Shield of Fate. By B. L. Farjeon. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

Rick. By David C. Falk. (Trischler.)

The Great Men. By John Davidson. (Ward & Downey.)

The Rudder Grangers Abroad. By Frank R. Stockton. (Sampson Low.)

The Little Minister proves—what When a Man's Single did not—that Mr. Barrie has the instinct, as well as the artistic endowment, of a novelist of the first class. It does not contain nearly so many clever—and characteristically clever—things as its predecessor. In When a Man's Single, however, Rob Angus's love affair was subordinated to his experiences in Thrums, Silchester, and Fleet-street. But in A Little Minister Gavin and Babbie are all in all, as are Bathsheba and Gabriel Oak in Far from the Madding Crowd. Thrums is here once more and at its best; but you forget it and its "characters" in wondering how Gavin and Babbie are to escape from the various difficulties into which they are plunged by circumstances and their increasing love for each other. Then there is here a story within a story—the story of Gavin's father and mother as well as the story of Gavin and Babbie. It is of a different sort from the other, being a tragedy of the Enoch Arden kind with Scotch variations. Mr. Barrie's chief triumph as a novelist lies in the skill with which he develops his two stories without allowing them to clash. But that triumph is undoubted and absolute. There need be no question now that, should Mr. Barrie leave Thrums, and try fresh fields, he will succeed in these as completely as he has done among his Auld Lights. No doubt both Babbie and Gavin—at least the Babbie and Gavin of Mr. Barrie's third volume—are delightful improbabilities. A gypsy, an Egyptian, a born actress, a daughter of Queen Mab, a half-sister to Ariel—it seems impossible that such a being should find a soul, a mission, and a husband in Thrums. That little Gavin, of religio paupertina all compact at twenty-one, should, under the influence of a passion, become not only a man, but a hero capable of facing death, ruin, a thousand emergencies and self-sacrifices—this, too, may seem incredible. The final catastrophe—the rumour of Gavin's death, the marriage over the tongs, the flood, the rescue of Gavin and Rintoul from sudden death—is, perhaps, too hurried, and also too suggestive of the influence of Mr. Thomas Hardy, although its details are worked up—and worked out—with perfect art. But improbabilities and impossibilities alike are forgotten when one reads and is carried away by The Little Minister, and this is the test of its power. Then the tragi-comedy of Gavin's troubles with his Auld Licht congregation—due to his infatuation for the Egyptian—can scarcely be said even to verge on burlesque. Mr. Barrie has made some remarkable additions to his Thrums gallery. The chief are the pre-centor-elder, the policeman, and (best of all) Nanny Webster, the poor woman who is really the means of bringing Gavin and Babbie together. The only character in The Little Minister that could well have been spared is Rob Dow, even although he saves Gavin Dishart's life. Rob's insane loyalty to his minister, especially when it takes the form of grotesque perjury, is an irritating element in the story. In my opinion The Little Minister is far and away the first novel of the season, and demonstrates that its author is a man, not only of talent, but of genius.

Vain Fortune is one of the least ambitious and least realistic of Mr. George Moore's stories, and is, in some parts, not altogether unpleasant. It contains no seduction, and only one suicide. There are of course patches of descriptive writing, like

"There the omnibuses stopped. A conductor shouted for fares, with the light of the public-house lamps on his open mouth. There was a smell of mud, of damp clothes, of bad tobacco; and, where the lights of the costermongers' barrows broke across the footway, the picture was of a group of three coarse loud-voiced girls, followed by boys. There were fish shops, cheap Italian restaurants, and the long lines of low houses vanished in crapulent night."

But, on the whole, these patches are fewer in Vain Fortune than in most of its author's works. In fact, it is essentially a commonplace story of essentially commonplace people, who are bent on demonstrating themselves to be the reverse. Hubert Price, an aspiring dramatist, who has sounded the depths of poverty in London, and has received solace—of the most innocent sort—from an aspiring actress, suddenly succeeds to a fortune. He has now time to write plays and to marry. Emily, the girl who ought to have obtained this fortune, wishes to appropriate him; but he prefers the widowed Julia, her rather matter of fact companion. They make a runaway match of it, and the morbid-minded Emily commits suicide. News of this reaches Julia and Herbert on their wedding night. There is a passionate scene, which, however, closes in this Mooreish fashion. "Herbert!" It was Julia calling him. Pale and overworn, but in all her woman's beauty, she came, offering herself as compensation for the burden of life." There is no lack of ability in Vain Fortune—there is never lack of ability in anything that Mr. Moore writes. But the book is not satisfactory, either as a psychological study or as a work of art.

The secret which underlies A Rude Awakening, and which is not revealed till the third volume, although it may be almost guessed in the first chapter, is a very unpleasant one. Mary Prior is really Mary Stanhope—the result of an adulterous connexion between one of the best of women and one of the best of men. She does not discover this until she is about to be married, although she has been in every way cared for by her father, Colonel Stanhope, for a number of years. She thereupon seeks to break off her marriage with her lover; but Philip Addison is a sensible man as well as a Christian and a scientific philanthropist, and is quite equal to the occasion, when he "knows all." Such a difficult business as this could not have been better or more delicately managed than it has been by Mrs. Phillips, although it must be allowed that the letter in which Mrs. Prior reveals to her daughter that she has been a "living lie" is terribly overstrained. Otherwise, A Rude Awakening is, in spite of its length, a well-constructed and well-told story. Philip Addison, Mary's lover, is a bit of a prig; but her half-sister Dolly and her successive husbands, Colonel Domville and Arthur Crofton, are all good sketches.

Mr. Farjeon is seen at his very worst in The Shield of Love. It is long winded, loose in plot, and full of the oleo-margarine of sentiment—is, in fact, the reductio ad absurdum of Dickensism in fiction. There is the raw material of a good scoundrel in Mr. Fox Cordery, and there is also the raw material of a first-class hero of the sorely-tried order in the gambler whom Mr. Fox Cordery seeks to ruin and supplant. But then, there is nothing but this raw material in The Shield of Love. It consists, in about equal measure, of blurred portraits and spoiled incidents.

Rick is a really good, vigorous, and vigorously-written story of Franco-Australian murder, mystery, and love-making. The plot and some of the scenes may suggest the idea that the author is an imitator of Mr. Fergus Hume. But, if this be the case, then the pupil has proved himself quite the equal of his master. If Rick does not contain the squalid and gruesome realism which made The Mystery of a Hansom Cab so very well suitable for production on the stage, the representation of the Vini-combe ménage is better than anything that is to be found in the older story. Jacques Hennepin Ranq, with a dozen aliases, the récidiviste and murderer, is a melodramatic figure in the best and the worst sense, and therefore in every way a success; as also is the drunken scoundrel who calls himself, but is not, the heroine's father. Rick herself is perhaps essentially what female novelists are in the habit of styling "a slip of a girl," and her successful lover is very much of what these same authorities term "a stick." Poor Philip her "brother," who is not her "brother," is, however, a capital portrait; and the peculiar relations between them, which are established as a result of the discovery that they are not related to each other, are handled with skill and delicacy.

It goes without saying that there is a great deal of cleverness in Mr. John Davidson's new volume. But it is certainly not equal to Perfereid, either in eccentric humor or in eccentric pathos. Possibly enough Mr. Davidson has not the faculty for telling stories of the length that are collected in The Great Men. Of these only one is thoroughly enjoyable—"The Schoolboy Tragedy." It must be allowed, however, to be superlatively good. The portrait of the merciless, almost murderous, Scotch schoolmaster, Mr. Huggle—a Squeers with a fragment of conscience—is excellent, and Jamie Cameron, the poor lad, the romance of whose nature is literally thrashed out of him, is also quite original. The second half of Mr. Davidson's volume, "A Practical Novelist," has already appeared under the title of The North Wall. The idea of personation—for literary and not for selfish ends—which is at the bottom of it is thoroughly new, and is very cleverly worked out.

The Rudder Grange vein of humour in Mr. Stockton is written out. This, and little else, is conclusively proved by the new collection of stories which he has published. Euphemia and Pomona have both become intolerable; at least they are most decidedly so in the first three stories in this volume—"Euphemia among the Pelicans," "The Rudder Grangers in England," and "Pomona's Daughter." On the other hand, there are two really good stories in this collection, "Derelict" and "The Water Devil." "Derelict" is simple, natural, and delightfully improbable, while the grotesque love-making in it—love-making is really Mr. Stockton's strong point, though he is unaware of the fact—has an old-fashioned Christmas flavour which is, as a rule, conspicuous by its absence from books that are ostensibly of the gift-book order.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

GIFT BOOKS.

Nurse Heatherdale's Story. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by L. Leslie Brooke. (Macmillans.) Though she has changed her illustrator, Mrs. Molesworth has by no means changed her style; and her publishers have rightly brought out her new Christmas story in the familiar form. It is interesting to be reminded that the long series began as far back as October, 1875, when Tell Me A Story first appeared under the now forgotten pseudonym of "Eonnis Graham"; and that the authoress did not assume her proper name until the publication of Grandmother Dear, in 1878. The first of these volumes had on its title-page the apt quotation from Blake:

"Piper, sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read."

So I wrote my happy songs,
Every child may joy to hear."

It cannot be denied that there is some monotony in Mrs. Molesworth's presentation of child-life, and still more in her portraiture of the well-meaning but somewhat awkward parent. But we shall always maintain that her realistic scenes of the nursery and the schoolroom stand on an altogether higher level than her excursions into the realms of fairyland. Her new book, we are glad to say, belongs to the earlier and happier class. If it does not introduce us to any creations worthy to be remembered with Carrots and Herr Baby, it furnishes at any rate pleasant and wholesome reading, such as appropriately comes from the mouth of an aged domestic. Concerning the illustrations, it is enough to say that they prove once again that "il n'y a pas un homme nécessaire."

César Cascabel. By Jules Verne. Profusely illustrated. (Sampson Low.) The Secret of the Magian: or, The Mystery of Ecbatana. By A. Laurie. Fully illustrated. (Same publisher.) These two books may conveniently be noticed together, for M. A. Laurie is nothing if not a faithful follower of M. Jules Verne. Last year, indeed, we thought that the disciple, in New York to Brest, had fairly equalled his master, in fertility of invention, definiteness of character, and sustained interest. But now M. Jules Verne has perhaps been stimulated by the rivalry to remind the world how much greater Napoleon was than any of his marshals. His present hero is a creation worthy of Alexandre Dumas. A French mountebank, after touring for twenty and more years in the United States, resolves to return to his beloved country, with his troupe and his caravan, without crossing the ocean. This he accomplishes by traversing the ice of Behring's Strait, and so through Siberia. Of course, the company encounter many thrilling adventures, and overcome them all. But the interest centres round the indomitable character and resourcefulness of the hero, who (we cannot but think) ought to have been a countryman of Tartarin, and not of Norman birth. The story of the other book has been suggested by the popularity of Mme. Dieulafoy, the wife of the explorer of Susa. Here it is a sister that accompanies a brother to discover the hidden site of Ecbatana, and to behold, only to lose again, the treasures of the Magi. The narrative is by no means badly told, and furnishes plenty of excitement; but the several personages are somewhat dimly defined. The thoroughly French atmosphere of both books is of itself a useful lesson to English boys.

Fifty-Two Further Stories for Boys. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Hutchinson.) Fifty-Two Further Stories for Girls. (Same editor and publisher.) Booksellers say that the long story which fills a volume is more popular than the collection of short tales; but Mr. Miles's volumes, which are becoming a regular Christmas institution, ought to prove—as they certainly deserve to prove—an exception to the general rule. Of late years the supply of good stories adapted to the taste of youthful readers of both sexes has been increasingly abundant, but the very abundance increases the difficulty of selection; and Mr. Miles has had no light labour in producing a couple of volumes, each containing a story for every week in the year, with not one unattractive item in either table of contents. The best-known purveyors of juvenile fiction are, of course, laid under contribution; but some of the most "taking" stories in both books are the work of authors whose names are more or less unfamiliar, at any rate on this side of the Atlantic. Whatever be the attractions of the "long story," it is generally laid aside after one hurried perusal, whereas Mr. Miles's volumes will be returned to again and again.

Two Friends and a Fiddle. By Helen Shipton. (S.P.C.K.) This story, which occupies some five hundred pages of print, well sustains the author's reputation. It is full of action, and full also of light and shade. There could scarcely be a stronger contrast than that between the scenes laid in the north country pit village and those in the romantic island of Sark. Miss Shipton does justice to both, and has evidently made her holiday rambles subservient to her purpose. One incident, irreproachable from a literary point of view, may perhaps be made troublesome to the venerable society which issues the book. Morris, the collier lad, is represented as being powerfully impressed by the sight of a great crucifix upon which he came suddenly on a lonely hill-side abroad. Timid subscribers to the society may wish to know whether it advocates the erection of such a symbol in Protestant England. For ourselves we can only say that the situation is well conceived, and that the tone of the whole story is as excellent as any parent could desire, while there is enough incident and adventure to satisfy the wholesome wants of any child.

Neal Russell. By M. Bramston. (Sonnen-schein.) The secondary title of this book is "A story of a brave man," and there can be no question of Neal Russell's magnanimous courage. A man who voluntarily undergoes five years' penal servitude for a crime which he did not commit, but to the committal of which he contributed indirectly and remotely, is undoubtedly a hero of a very rare and distinguished kind. At the same time, the story opens up a problem of casuistry which is not quite so easy as the author appears to think. As a matter of law, Neal Russell's deliberate suppression of the truth in order to shield his cousin was an abatement of felony; and though in the supreme court of ethics, where motives outweigh overt acts, his self-sacrifice might be deemed worthy of commendation, his conduct approaches perilously close to the forbidden rule of doing evil that good may come. To this needed criticism, however, it must be added that the story is powerful and wholesome, and is very well told. A word of praise must also be given to the printing and get-up of the book, which is resplendent with pictorial head and tail pieces, and initial letters. It does credit to the firm of Swan Sonnenschein, as well as to the well-known printers, Messrs. Butler & Tanner, of Frome.

Silas Verney. By Edgar Pickering. (Blackie.) Like so many of the boys' books of our day, this story is based on the desire to teach history through the agency of fiction. Silas Verney is a youth who is supposed to have lived in the days of the second Charles, and his very exciting adventures are partly moulded by the historical circumstances of those times. Naturally the style of the narrative—which is autobiographical—is accommodated, though with varying success, to its assumed origin. It would probably be regarded as hyper-criticism if we were to point out the marvellous coincidences and improbabilities of the story, but there is no disputing its interest; and that is after all, what boys chiefly care for. The illustrations are of unusual force and merit.

The Lord of Dymcor. A Tale of the Times of Edward I. By E. Everett-Green. (Nelson.) Miss Everett Green is a well-known caterer of lively and interesting stories for children, but we cannot say that this is quite so successful a production as others of hers we have read. Like the preceding book, this is also a book based on history, and the authoress has been good enough to supply a key telling us the fictitious points and characters which are added to its genuinely historical foundation. The story is full of exciting adventures, and will, we have little doubt, be read by boys with avidity. The historical background is also so true and accurately presented that it must add to its readers' knowledge of the modes of life and speech current in the days of Edward I. The character of the heroine, Lady Gertrude Montacute, is very charmingly portrayed; and the story, spite of a few drawbacks in construction, is one that must cordially be commended. A word of praise must also be given to the two illustrations which adorn the book.

Royal Youths. By Ascott R. Hope. (Fisher Unwin.) These stories—of which those of Louis XIII. and Queen Anne's son the Duke of Gloucester are the best—are excellently told by Mr. Hope. They are well calculated to attract a boy to history, by showing him that, properly handled, it is really a very interesting kind of story.

Richard Tregellas. By D. Lawson Johnstone. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) A first-rate story of adventures in the West Indies 100 years ago. Troubles with Frenchmen, troubles with false brethren, a buried treasure, and the consolation of a lovely young lady with whom to live happily ever after, compose a very satisfactory book.

A Romance of N'Shabe. By A. A. Anderson and A. Wall. (Chapman & Hall.) This is a mixture of Mr. Rider Haggard and Mr. H. M. Stanley. Three men start on a hunting expedition in South Africa, to discover the Queen of Sheba and find the stolen daughter of one of the three. There is no great probability in the story, and there is too small a proportion of action to the amount of description; but it is readable.

The Story of the Life of Mackay of Uganda told for Boys. By his Sister. (Hodder & Stoughton.) It is needless to state that we have in this account of the life of Mackay of Uganda the story of a career of wonderful self-denial and resolute perseverance. The author's larger work, Mackay of Uganda, has made us aware of the splendid devotion of her brother, and the volume before us is to be criticised as a book "written especially for boys." "A Look for boys" we do not think it can accurately be called. It is a book for lads of eighteen or twenty, who cannot fail to be impressed by the earnest seriousness with which a sister describes the unselfish bravery of her brother, and may in some cases be persuaded to go and do likewise. "The whole of the matter in the volume is fresh," but no new facts of importance are given us. It is natural that the author should find herself unable to avoid a certain gravity and intensity of style which boys will consider dull. But this gravity and intensity will very powerfully impress boys who are beginning to think and to ask themselves what they intend to do when they become men. A portrait of Mackay and twelve tolerable illustrations accompany the volume.

Tib and Sib. By Stella Austin. (Masters.) Though described as a "story for children," the account of Tib's adventures will be found entertaining by readers of all ages. Indeed, we are not sure that the children are not treated rather from the point of view of their elders than of themselves. To a child the story would seem rather cloudy and disconnected. But the book is written charmingly, and Tib is a little girl we fall in love with at first sight. We are much obliged to the author for refraining from making her die at the end of the tale. For a page or two we were in dread of this catastrophe. As it is, the sombre concluding chapters seem almost out of place after their sunny predecessors. The illustrations are not quite so bad as they might be.

Hatherley's Homespuns, by Anette Lyster (S.P.C.K.), has an undoubted claim to be described as above the ordinary run of "Gift Books." It is a well conceived, graphic, and powerfully written narrative of the gradual reformation of a selfish, peevish, and jealous brother by a devoted sister. The chief fault to be found in it—a fault not uncommon in books of the "goody" and improving class—is that the demon of selfishness takes such an unnaturally long time and so many reiterated efforts to exorcise, that the book becomes slightly wearying and monotonous. Doubtless there are such feeble and exacting natures as Charlie Hatherley's; but the authoress should remember that, in the artistic evolution of a character, some allowance should be made for the slightly different standpoint of the reader.

Gladys Anstruther. By Louisa Thompson. (Blackie.) Here is a story abounding in thrilling incidents and romantic situations. The heroine, falsely accused of drugging her step-brother, runs away from home and joins a troupe of strolling players, where she sees a new phase of life and one which has a strong fascination for most children. We think the injuncta noverca business rather overdone; but in other respects the story is pleasant reading, and the illustrations are somewhat out of the common run.

The Family Difficulty. By Sarah Doudney. (Hutchinson.) The troubles of an impulsive generous orphan who finds herself domiciled with selfish worldlings is the subject of this story. The heroine's character is elaborated with some care, and somewhat artfully contrasted with the graceful self-indulgence of her invalid aunt and her commonplace daughters. Unfortunately the promise of the opening chapters is not fulfilled. Phoebe's adventures after she runs away are improbable and yet uninteresting, and are too hurriedly told. The book begins as if a three-volume novel were intended, but suddenly compresses itself and crams the two last volumes into the end of the first. The illustrations are not ungraceful, but the artist seems to become nervous when he attempts to draw the heroine; she is always hideous.

Miss Pussie, by Maud Carew (S.P.C.K.), is a small story, which yet inculcates an important and much-needed moral. This is briefly that unselfishness—or what claims its attributes and wears its garb—may really be a subtly-veiled and disguised form of selfishness. Like many another young lady, Sybil Ashton was fully persuaded that she was the embodiment of all filial and family virtue, till her eyes were opened for her by her friend, Miss Armitage, who is the Miss Pussie that gives the name to the story. The story, though not particularly well told, is undeniably wholesome, and of the greatest possible utility.

Littlebourne Lock, by F. Bayford Harrison (Blackie), tells the pathetic story of a London child half-brutalised by living in "slums," but whose better nature is gradually brought out by the patient kindness of her relatives and by a life at Littlebourne Lock, somewhere on the Thames. The different incidents likely to befall in a lock-house are graphically told; and, though the telling of the story is not perfect, it must be pronounced to be interesting and occasionally exciting.

The Love-Dream of Gatty Fenning. By Sarah Doudney. (Hutchinson.) Miss Fenning's love dream does not differ much from the love dreams of other young ladies, who pin their affections without much thought or discrimination on the first good-looking and wealthy young man with whom they are thrown in contact; but her awakening from that dream is an event of an unusually propitious and satisfactory kind. The moral of the book, and there can be no question of its soundness, is that every young lady who has in her the making or "promises of a noble woman," as Mr. Vardye puts it, ought to throw over an amiable but empty-headed "masher" for a genuine, hard-working clergyman. But it may be doubted whether it is a moral which will prove attractive to the average society young lady. At the same time, those who refuse to accept it may be liable to be classed among that large majority of the sex who do not possess "the promises of a noble woman." The story, which is, in respect of plot, of the simplest kind, is interesting and graphically told; and the authoress's description of the evolution of Gatty Fenning from the uncultured and finery-loving young lady to the "noble woman" aforesaid, displays considerable insight into what we may distinguish as feminine psychology.

Nicco. By C. A. Jones. (Sonnenschein.) Nicco is a pretty story, gracefully told. The hero is a little baronet who is wrecked as a baby on the coast of Brittany, and discovered when he has reached the age of seven. His trials and bewilderment at being suddenly transplanted to English surroundings are realised very vividly and described with genuine sympathy. There is tender feeling in the tale, but no affectation, and no attempt at fine writing. The illustrations would be better away.

Waiting and Serving. By Maude M. Butler. (Nelson.) The author's hope that some of her readers may be "loath to say good-bye to Daffodil, Filoselle, and the others" is not extravagant, and will in most cases be gratified. Her story is simple and unpretentious, and sure to be found interesting by all sensible children. It is not too long, it is pretty bound, and the few illustrations are graceful. The promised sequel will certainly be welcomed by all readers of the first tale, and, if written with the same carefulness and simplicity, will give general satisfaction.

Three Bright Girls. By A. E. Armstrong. (Blackie.) Miss Armstrong has written a simple, pure, and interesting story. The three girls from affluence are suddenly reduced to poverty, yet by their bright disposition and happy manners captivate desirable lovers. They never flag from the beginning, and is told pleasantly. It may be safely recommended as a present for a girl.

Polly, who was Nobody's Child. By Robina F. Hardy. (S.P.C.K.) This is a charmingly-told story of a little foundling—all of whose friends are gone, as the little two-year old pathetically expresses it, "way, way." But we need hardly add that the little waif not only finds a kind home, but ultimately becomes recognised as the grand-daughter and heiress of Squire Holcombe, of Holcombe Hall. As this is the inevitable destiny of all foundlings, at any rate in books, there is no more to be said, except to remark on the enlarged and improved scope of special Providence found in fiction, and to regret that it is not more recognisable in natura rerum.

Comrades True. By E. D. Adams. (Olipbant, Anderson & Ferrier.) This is an amusing tale of two children who were inseparables. They get into divers scrapes, and, following Sir John Lubbock's example, make observations upon ants. After one of these rambling and forbidden excursions, they solemnly forgive a kind uncle who finds fault with them. Unlike other stories, the book has no hint of lovemaking throughout. A word of praise is due to Miss E. Scannell's illustrations.

Hepsey, Gipsy, by L. T. Meade (Methuen), is dedicated to Mr. Smith of Coalville, and is a capital tale of gipsy life. The milk of human kindness in the despised Hephzibah is true to nature in other stations of life than a gipsy tent. Jack O'Lantern is a charming gipsy baby.

The Doll's Dressmaker, by A. F. Jackson (S.P.C.K.), gives the history of a poor girl who is adopted by gentlefolk. After some years her disreputable mother claims her; and the girl, to avoid legal proceedings, and with a strong sense of duty, rejoins her. There is much dialogue in this story, which is cleverly told throughout. Finally the heroine marries an old lover, and settles near Exmouth.

King Must. By Ethel. (Griffith, Farrer & Co.) The royal obligation which gives its title to this trifle is that of paying debts. It may be taken as a justifiable and much-needed exposé of the lax opinion of society, more especially of fashionable ladies on this subject. The book is well written, but does not call for further notice.

The Corswain's Bride: and other Tales. By R. M. Ballantine. (Nisbet.) A tale of the sea and a wreck on a desert island in Mr. Ballantine's best style, a tale of sea and land and a tale of East End slumming which is hardly up to the same level, make up the volume.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE understand that the forthcoming work on Persia by Hon. George Curzon, M.P., which was already in the printers' hands when he accepted office as Under Secretary for India, will be published by Messrs. Longmans early in the new year, a slight delay having been caused by the engraving of the necessary maps. It will consist of two volumes of 650 pages each. Mr. Curzon hopes to bring out later on a third volume, containing a bibliography and other appendices.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press a reprint of Mr. George Meredith's rare volume of poems, Modern Love (1862), to which the author has added others entitled "The Sage enamoured" and "The Honest Lady."

MR. W. J. FITZPATRICK, the editor of O'Connell's Correspondence, is engaged upon a volume entitled Secret Service under Pitt, which will be published by Messrs. Longmans. It happens that Mr. B. F. Stevens is to read a paper on the same subject before the Historical Society next Thursday.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has in readiness the fourth edition of English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages, by M. J. J. Jusserand, translated by Miss Lucy Toulmin Smith. To this edition a new prefatory note has been added by the author; and a heliogravure frontispiece of "English Knights Travelling," from a fourteenth-century painting, replaces the old one.

M. GABRIEL SARRAZIN, the author of two excellent volumes of essays on the English poets of this century, published under the title of La Renaissance de la Poésie anglaise, is about to issue a work of a somewhat original kind, named "La Montée" (Perrin et Cie). It depicts a series of mental states—the "ascent" of a soul—in a sort of imaginary journal of the inner life.

A NEW volume in Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's "Children's Library" will be published next week under the title of The Little Princess and the Great Plot. Miss Lina Eckenstein is the author, and Mr. Dudley Heath illustrates the book.

MESSRS. EDEN, REMINGTON & Co. have in the press a new novel by Dorothea Gerard, entitled On the Way Through; also A Garrison Romance, by Mrs. Leith Adams.

A DOMESTIC drama by Mr. Benjamin Gates, entitled That Barber's Boy, is announced to be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

THE Allgemeine Zeitung, of Munich, in an article on Mr. Hall Caine, says that "The Scapegoat" gives him a claim to recognition not only as an English but as a European man of letters. The book is to appear shortly in a German translation.

THE article on "The Dignity of Labour in the Talmud," read by the Rev. H. Gollancz at the recent International Congress of Orientalists, has been translated into Hebrew, and published in the Hamelits, of St. Petersburg, for November 25—26.

THE following are the lecture arrangements at the Royal Institution before Easter:—Prof. J. G. McKendrick, six Christmas lectures to juveniles on "Life in Motion, or the Animal Machine"; Prof. Victor Horsley, twelve lectures on "The Structure and Functions of the Nervous System (The Brain)"; Mr. A. S. Murray, three lectures on "Some Aspects of Greek Sculpture in Relief"; Prof. E. Ray Lankester, three lectures on "Some Recent Biological Discoveries"; Prof. W. P. Ker, three lectures on "The Progress of Romance in the Middle Ages"; Dr. B. Arthur Whitelegge, three lectures on "Epidemic Waves"; Prof. C. A. Fleming, three lectures on "The Induction Coil and Transformer"; Lord Rayleigh, six lectures on "Matter: at Rest and in Motion"; Prof. J. F. Bridge, three lectures on "Dramatic Music, from Shakspeare to Dryden (The Play, the Masque, and the Opera)," with illustrations. The Friday evening meetings will begin on January 22, when a discourse will be given by Lord Rayleigh on "The Composition of Water"; succeeding discourses will probably be given by Sir George Douglas, Prof. Roberts-Austen, Mr. G. J. Symons, Prof. Percy F. Frankland, Sir David Sulomons, Prof. L. C. Miall, Prof. Oliver Lodge, Mr. George du Maurier, Dr. John Evans, Mr. F. T. Piggott, and Prof. W. E. Ayrton.

A MEETING of the English Goethe Society will be held on Monday next, December 14, at 7.30 p.m., in the rooms of the Royal Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, when Dr. Eugene Oswald will read a paper on "Chamisso," dealing with his life, his poems, and his masterpiece Peter Schlemihl, in connexion with Goethe's Faust.

THE sale of autographs by Messrs. Sotheby on Friday and Saturday next has lost more than half its interest by the announcement that lots 43 to 114 are withdrawn. These lots consist of a series of letters and books connected with the Junius controversy, including the copy of Junius's Letters which Sir Philip Francis gave to his wife on their marriage in 1814, and the original holograph letter in which Junius referred to a rumoured marriage in the Public Advertiser of September 7, 1769. For this collection the reserve price was £250. Among the letters remaining to be sold are some thirty addressed by Dickens to Macready; an interesting one from Thackeray at Rome, giving an account of his forthcoming work, Cornhill to Cairo; another interesting one by Lamb, about Defoe; one of Byron's, treating of his relations with Brougham; and one of Browning's, the addressee of which is surely misdescribed as "W. H." Smith.

MESSRS. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & COMPANY have issued this week the first volume of their "Oriental Miscellany," consisting of a revised edition of Bernier's Travels, edited by Mr. Archibald Constable himself. On the present occasion, we must be content to notice some of its bibliographical curiosities. The cloth cover and the paper wrapper are both impressed with a graceful Oriental design; and the latter bears in addition the information, for postal purposes, that the book weighs 27 ounces, or 65.53 tolas (the Indian unit), or 765.81 grammes. All copies intended for sale in India will be enclosed in an outside cover of a transparent waterproof material, thoroughly closed on all sides, so as to prevent deterioration from damp, heat, dust, and insects. The net price is 6s., or four rupees eight annas, which Anglo-Indians will reluctantly recognise as the current rate of exchange. At the beginning is a slip appropriating this particular copy to the editor of the ACADEMY—a much more pleasing method than that adopted by some publishers of stamping the title-page; while at the end are a set of slips intended for the use of librarians. The book bears no less than three trade devices—those of the publisher, the printer, and the binder. Besides reproductions of maps and minor illustrations, it has a fine coloured facsimile of a contemporary portrait of Sháh Jahán. It is perhaps needless to add that it also has an elaborate bibliography and a copious index. Finally—what might not have been guessed—the imprint is Westminster, and not London. It has been a pleasure to record these not insignificant details, though the catalogue is by no means exhausted; and it is a no less pleasant duty to wish prosperity to the firm which bears a name so honoured in English literature, and which has begun its career in a manner that would have gladdened the heart of the late Sir Henry Yule.

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

WITH the beginning of the new year, the New Review is to be considerably enlarged, both in the size and in the number of the pages, and at the same time the price is to be raised from sixpence to one shilling. The January number will contain the opening chapters of an unpublished novel by Thomas Carlyle; and also articles by M. Paul Bourget, Mme. Adam, and Mr. Augustine Birrell.

THE programme of Harper's Magazine for the coming year comprises—a new novel by Mr. W. D. Howell, entitled "A World of Chance," which is described as characteristically American; a personal memoir of the Brownings, by Anne Thackeray Ritchie; reminiscences of Nathaniel Hawthorne, by his college friend, Mr. Horatio Bridge; a series of papers entitled "From the Black Forest to the Black Sea," by Mr. Poultney Bigelow, illustrated by Messrs. F. D. Millet and Alfred Parsons; and also articles on the German, Austrian, and Italian armies.

Harper's Bazar—which, we fancy, does not circulate much in this country—will rely for its serials on two English writers, Mr. Walter Besant and Mr. William Black; while Mrs. Oliphant is mentioned next in order among the contributors for 1892.

THE January number of the Bookman will contain an early portrait of Robert Browning, on plate paper, similar to the portrait of Lord Tennyson in the first number; also an important Burns document, which will be printed in facsimile, occupying two pages of the magazine.

THE January number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review will be specially devoted to Central Asia and the Pamirs, treating the question from Russian, French, and English standpoints. It will contain an autograph map by Colonel Gramscheffsky, illustrating his explorations; and one by Mr. C. Johnston, of Derwaz and Karategin. Mr. Ravenstein will probably contribute a map of the Pamir that will illustrate Dr. Leitner's first paper of a series on Hunza, Nagyr, and the Pamirs. Dr. G. Capus explains the agriculture of the sub-Pamirian regions, and speaks of permanent dwellers in the Pamir, which Mr. Littledale has called practically uninhabitable and uninhabited. Prof. A. Vambéry is also expected to write a paper on the Central Asian question generally. Authorities "behind the scenes" will discuss whether we, or Russia, can rely on China in any complication that may arise with India.

A NEW volume of the Young Man will commence with the January number, which will contain an illustrated article on "Mr. Gladstone's Home Life," written by one of his neighbours. Mr. Price Hughes will write on "How to conquer an Audience;" Mr. George Manville Fenn will contribute a complete tale; Prof. Blackie will write the first of a series of papers, entitled: "When I was a Young Man: Recollections and Reflections" which are to be continued during the year by some of the "grand old men" of our time; Dr. Gordon Stables gives a "Health Sermon," and Archdeacon Farrar and Mr. Edmund Gosse are to write on "The Best Use of Leisure."

THE January number of Scribner's will have an article on "Bokhara Revisited," by the Rev. Dr. Henry Lunsdell; and a second illustrated paper by the Blashfields, describing excursions with donkey-boys along the banks of the Nile.

THE two new serial stories in Temple Bar will be written by Mr. Maarten Maartens and an anonymous author, whose novel is entitled "Aunt Anne."

ON December 15 will appear a new penny illustrated monthly, edited by Mr. Frederick A.

Atkins, entitled the Home Messenger. The first number contains a complete tale by Edward Garrett, illustrated by Gordon Brown; an article on "The Gentle Art of Home Making," by Annie S. Swan; a portrait and character sketch of Dr. Maclaren; a paper on "Health and How to preserve it," by Dr. Gordon Stables; and contributions by Dr. Parker, the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, and the Rev. W. J. Dawson.

To the new series of the Welcome Hour Mr. Mackenzie Bell will contribute a popular article, entitled, "Charles Kingsley: the Story of His Life."

THE next number of the Religious Review of Reviews will contain articles on "Lord Plunket and the Spanish Reformers"; "Religion versus Morality in Spain"; "The National Society"; "The Bishop of Ripon at Home"; "Six Delusions with respect to the Church," by the Bishop of Southwell; "The Sermon of the Month," by Archdeacon Farrar; "The Children's Sunday," by the Rev. G. S. Reaney; &c., &c.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

AT the very end of last term a memorial was presented to the Hebdomadal Council at Oxford, which alone possesses the right of initiating legislation, suggesting the establishment of a final honour school of English language and literature. This memorial was signed by 108 members of Congregation; that is to say, nearly one-third of the whole body. Among the names representing classical studies we may mention the professor of Latin, the Camden professor of ancient history, the provost of Oriel, the reader in Greek, the reader in Latin, and the reader in ancient history. Within the last week the following reply to the memorial has been received:

"The Council do not think it expedient at present to propose a new honour school in the final examination, but are willing to consider any proposals not involving the establishment of a new school."

MEANWHILE, the question of compulsory Greek at Cambridge has arisen in a new form. Some of those who were strongly opposed to any change in the Previous Examination have signed a memorial, suggesting that the whole question of degrees in science should be reconsidered by the University, with a view to exempting science students from examination in Greek.

ON the occasion of presenting Prof. Maitland for the honorary degree of LL.D. at Cambridge last week, the Public Orator (Ed. Sandys) adopted the reformed pronunciation of Latin, which was also used by the Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Peile) in admitting to the degree.

THE election to the chair of human and comparative anatomy at Oxford, vacant by the death of Prof. Moseley, will be held at the Royal College of Physicians on December 21. Prof. Ray Lankester at present fills the post of deputy-professor.

CONVOCAION at Oxford has sanctioned a second grant of £25 in aid of the archaeological excavations at Chester.

THE new Educational Review continues to devote a large proportion of its space to academical subjects. The December number contains articles on "Women Students at Oxford," by Miss Annie M. H. Rogers and Mr. Arthur Sidgwick; and on "The Study of Greek at Oxford and Cambridge," by Messrs. W. C. Sidgwick and A. G. Vernon-Harcourt, while Mr. Arthur Tilley explains the new scheme for the mediæval and modern languages tripos. From a note here printed, we learn that two out of the recently-elected fellows at Oxford began their careers as boys in public elementary schools, one at Oxford itself, and the other at Plymouth.

UNDER the title of Minerva (Strassburg: Trübner), the publisher himself, together with Dr. Kekula of Klagenfurt, has compiled what we may call a Universal University Calendar. In their preface the joint-authors admit the difficulties they have endeavoured to surmount, and express the hope that future issues may be more satisfactory. From an English point of view, indeed, the shortcomings of this first attempt are so conspicuous that we must strongly urge the desirability of obtaining the assistance of some one acquainted with our insular anarchy. For example, London and Calcutta are each represented as having more than 5000 students; Nottingham as having more than Oxford, and Cambridge only 1027; while Bombay and Madras are omitted altogether. Nor are the occupants of English chairs brought down even to the date of last summer. Prof. E. A. Freeman may be interested to learn that he stands in a class apart with Prof. Edgeworth; while his colleague, Prof. Montagu Burrows, is placed under "Humaniora," and Prof. Napier under "Modern Philology." But as a guide to the teaching staff of the continental universities, this excellently printed little book will prove invaluable. It is enough to say that its index contains a total of about thirteen thousand names.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A LOVE-MISSIVE.

(The "Ad Amatam" of Furius.)

O beauty, kindness, purity,
 Are Woman's noblest dower:
 Rose-sweet, and even so fair, is she—
 Heaven's star, earth's loveliest flower!
 But, tho' no share in these you claim—
 You, who my heart possess—
 I vow to love you all the same,
 And love you none the less.
 For I will love for love's sweet sake,
 That can this world transform—
 A garden in the desert make,
 A stillness 'midst the storm:
 That, with one touch, old bonds can break,
 And for old wrongs atone:
 Then let me love for love's sweet sake,
 And love's sweet sake alone!

GEORGE DOUGLAS.

OBITUARY.

ARCHDEACON BALSTON.

THE Ven. E. Balston, D.D., late Archdeacon of Derby, and formerly Head Master of Eton, died suddenly from failure of the heart's action at Bakewell Vicarage, on Advent Sunday, November 29, having just completed his seventy-fourth year. He had taken part in the morning service, and had celebrated the Holy Communion; immediately afterwards he complained of feeling unwell, and retired to his study, where in half-an-hour the end came. His death removes a figure well known and popular among many generations of Etonians for the last sixty years; while to not a few of his surviving contemporaries, his old pupils, and those who worked under him, he was the object of a deep and abiding affection.

Edward Balston was born at Maidstone on November 26, 1817, a younger son of the late Mr. William Balston, a local manufacturer who was also a county magistrate. Some touching notices of a still younger brother, Henry Balston, who died just as he was leaving Rugby for the University, occur in Stanley's Life of Arnold. Edward Balston was sent to Eton at the early age then usual, and placed under the tuition of the Rev. E. Coleridge, known to fame as the tutor of Mr. Gladstone and many other distinguished men. In due course he proceeded to King's College, Cambridge, where he was a Scholar and afterwards a Fellow. In his second year at Eton, 1836, he obtained the Newcastle Scholarship, that admirable scholar Rowland Williams, his senior by three months, taking the second place as medallist; at the University this order was reversed, Williams carrying off the University Scholarship, the highest honour then open to Kingsmen, in his second year. Balston in his third (1839). At Cambridge he twice gained the Browne medal for Latin Alcaics (1838-9). In 1836 he had also played the Eton Eleven at Lord's. It is said by those who remember him at school that, in those rough times for boys, he was ever remarkable for his blameless conduct and high moral tone.

Immediately on taking his degree in 1842 he returned to Eton as an assistant master, and continued to occupy that post for the next twenty years. His appointment coincided with the death of Provost Goodall, the succession of the Whig Provost Hodgson, and the beginning of further changes at Eton, Hawtrey, the then Head Master, having now a freer hand. Besides vast architectural improvements in the interests of health and comfort, concessions were made to the modern spirit in education. Balston's attitude towards these reforms was typical of his subsequent Head Mastership: he accepted them without regret, but without enthusiasm, and in a spirit of loyalty to his chief. At this period, it would seem, theological views took the shape which they retained in after years, when he had become dignitary of the Church; he was a moderate High Churchman, who stopped short of Tractarianism or Ritualism. He was influenced both by his old tutor Coleridge and by G. J. Selwyn, at this time curate of Windsor, afterwards Bishop of New Zealand and of Lichfield. The friendship now formed with Bishop Selwyn had important consequences in his after life. His success as an assistant master was proved by the general voice which called him to the Head Mastership at an unforeseen crisis. Somewhat easy-going as an exactor of work, he was stern where moral questions were concerned; kind not only on the surface, but of heart, and full of sympathy in illness and trouble. One thing he insisted on—that boys should hold (or at least express) no opinions on speculative subjects which had not received the sanction of authority. He was seriously annoyed when a pupil, who afterwards became an eminent judge, enriched a Latin theme with allusions to Bayle and the Encyclopædists.

In 1850 he married a daughter of the late Rev. Thomas Carter, Vice-Provost of Eton, who survives him; the Rev. Canon Carter, Clewer, and the Rev. W. A. Carter, Fellow-Bursar of Eton College, are his brothers-in-law. In 1860 he was elected a Fellow of Eton and prepared to devote himself to parochial work. This, however, was not yet to be, the death of Provost Hawtrey in January, 1862, the Provostship was pressed upon Goodford, who, then in the prime of life, would have preferred to continue his life as Head Master rather than accept a post of comparative retirement. It was understood that the choice had been that of the Provost's Consort, then just deceased, and that it would be very difficult to decline the honour. Eton thus found herself, in the middle of the school-time, at a loss for a head master, the hitherto unbroken rule requiring one who was or had been an assistant master, and a man of more mature years than had been usual at some other public schools. All eyes were now turned upon Balston; and he was requested, not only by those on the spot, by many influential old Etonians, to sacrifice his private wishes, and undertake the headship of the school. By the end of February he had donned his harness, and had begun office with a short address to the boys, in which he appealed to them for "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together." It has been said of him with perfect truth that, though not a great head master, he fully maintained the best traditions of the school. Very early in his career he had to face the Public Schools Commission of 1862. He characteristically declined to theorise on the best possible education for English gentlemen, or to suggest "views" for its improvement. It was enough for him that he had been called upon to administer an existing system. No more brilliant scholar of the older type has presided over the destinies of Eton; but it must be admitted that he lacked something of the breadth of general culture which has distinguished Keate's other successors, Hawtrey, Goodford, and the two who still survive. His popularity with the boys was, it is believed, unparalleled either at Eton or any other public school. Many causes may have contributed to this: the kindness which tempered his firmness; the simplicity which accompanied his dignity; his keen sympathy with boyish feelings and pursuits; his conservatism, dear above all things to the mind of the English public schoolboy; most of all, perhaps, his handsome features and fine presence. He looked every inch a head master, and his "inches" did not fall far short of six feet. But though a conservative, he was in no sense reactionary; and two reforms in particular ought to be mentioned to his credit, as likely to be forgotten amid the rush of subsequent changes. He was the first to introduce French into the school work of a large number of the boys; and he swept away the last vestiges of the old system of "shirking out of bounds," which his immediate predecessor had only seen his way partially to abolish. No head master could be pleasanter to those who worked under him; but impatient young reformers, who tried to force his hand, were easily and humorously repulsed. The time came, however, when the demand for further changes, backed by public opinion, knocked loudly at the gates of Eton. When, just before the Christmas holidays of 1867, he announced his resignation, the situation was evident; he saw that more extensive changes were inevitable, and preferred that they should be carried out by another rather than by himself. He had administered the school successfully, but in the main on the old lines, for six years of transition; he was only just fifty years of age, and his long cherished desire, not for leisure, but for work of a different kind, might now be gratified. When the school met after the holidays, Dr. Hornby was the new head master.

Twenty-four years more of life and work, and these, perhaps, the happiest of all, still remained to him. He was at once elected an Honorary Fellow, and thus retained the right of occupying the college pulpit; on the first vacancy he was restored to his former position as a Foundation Fellow, and accepted a living in the immediate neighbourhood of Eton. He was not long destined to remain there. By 1868, Bishop Selwyn had been translated from New Zealand to Lichfield, and was anxious to secure for his present diocese the services of one whom in early days he had learnt to appreciate. At the instance of the Bishop, and with the consent of the patrons of both livings, an exchange was effected, and Balston became vicar of Bakewell; in 1873 he was appointed archdeacon of Derby. His first act was to re-constitute the vicarage on as commodious a scale as the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield permitted; his simple private means continued to be devoted to the needs of the Church. At his own expense he restored the chancel of his own church, and the entire church of Monias (or Monyash), a small parish near Bakewell, of which he was the patron; while to the ill-endowed and over-burdened clergy, the "Crawleys" of his archdeaconry, he was as an earthly Providence. In the Lower House of Convocation he speedily attained an influential position; though without the gifts of oratory he spoke effectively, and (like Lord Althorp in a greater sphere) led by his good sense and the weight of his character. After Bishop Selwyn's time, the archdeaconry of Derby was attached to the newly erected diocese of Southwell. For some little time, we believe, he had ceased to attend Convocation. Two or three years ago, during a severe frost, he had the misfortune to break his arm by a fall in his garden, and afterwards was never quite the same man. Symptoms of a weak heart had likewise shown themselves at intervals, though latterly he had seemed stronger; and a few months since he resigned his archdeaconry.

To a man who had so lived, his sudden and painless death must be pronounced an unmingled blessing. At three o'clock on Friday, December 4, by the light of an exquisite winter sunset, many sincere mourners from far and near were gathered to the simple and touching funeral service in the College Chapel and Cemetery of Eton.

WOLCOTT BALESTIER.

THE death of Mr. Wolcott Balestier will be a serious loss to many English authors. Though he stood to the profession of the pen in the relation of publisher, he was also a fellow-writer; and not a few of the more prominent men and women of letters regarded him first of all as a friend. He came to England three years ago as the representative of Mr. Lovell, of New York. Within the past year he was the originator and chief director of the continental publishing firm, Heinemann & Balestier, Limited, the rival of the older house of Baron Tauchnitz. As an author, he is only known to English readers in the character of Mr. Kipling's collaborator in the story, "The Naulahka," now running in the Century Magazine; but he has left a complete novel and several short tales behind him. Mr. Balestier was only twenty-eight years of age. His death cuts short a career of the highest promise.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

WE are glad to find that Mr. R. H. Hope is still continuing his catalogue of holy wells in the Antiquary. In the present number he deals with some of those of Cumberland and Derbyshire. Mr. Hope is, as far as we know, the first person who has endeavoured to give a list of the springs which our forefathers thought holy. As a first attempt, his work must necessarily be imperfect, but what he has done will facilitate the labours of future inquirers. Mr. Ward's paper on provincial museums relates this time to Sheffield. It must be a most interesting collection, as it contains on loan the Bateman collections, which represent a life's diggings among barrows. We are no friend to centralisation, but cannot read month after month these interesting sketches of local museums without wishing that in some way or other they could be placed under the control of a central authority. Local museums are not only of value because they are a means of preserving valuable objects which would otherwise perish; but as a means of education, we know from personal experience that the historic objects preserved in our museums are a great attraction to many who have had few other means of knowing what was the life of their remote ancestors. Mr. James Hilton, the great authority on chronograms, continues his papers on a subject which he has so specially made his own.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR R. F. BURTON'S WORKS.
67 Baker-street, Portman-square: Dec. 3, 1891.

I am preparing (besides writing my husband, Sir Richard Burton's, Life), his "Catullus" and his "Pentamerone" for the press. When ready, I shall issue circulars to subscribers, as in the case of the "Arabian Nights."

It is my intention to produce, by degrees, all his still unpublished works, the smaller things in magazines, and his unfinished works as a miscellaneous collection, so that nothing may be lost to the world that he has written. There is a demand for some of his past works; and I think, as I have not capital to reproduce them myself, I cannot do better than sell the copyrights to men who can. I can to-day dispose of the following copyrights:

- The original three volumes of the "Pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina" (1855).
"First Footsteps in East Africa," (1856).
"Lake Regions of Equatorial Africa," in two volumes (1860).
"The City of the Saints" (1861).
"Vickram and the Vampire" (1870).
"Goa and the Blue Mountains" (1851).
"Scinde; or, The Unhappy Valley," in two volumes (1851).
"Sindh; or, The Races that Inhabit the Valley of the Indus" (1851).
"Sindh Revisted," in two volumes (1877).
"The Nile Basin" (1876).
"Etruscan Bologna" (1876).

I have still to see seven publishers about the rest of the works, so as to settle between us how far my rights go and how far theirs. Some of them have lost their contracts by fire or otherwise, but I have got all mine; and I expect when I produce them that I shall find I have still some more copyrights to offer. Meantime, I shall be glad to receive offers for those I have named.

ISABEL BURTON.

NOTES ON HERO[N]DAS.

Trinity College, Dublin: Dec. 4, 1891.

The "Addendum" just published by Mr. Kenyon contains two fragments of great interest—I and 6. The first of these is clearly, as Mr. Kenyon suggests, the sequel of the three lines published on p. 39 (VIII.). Whether it is an immediate sequel may be doubted. In the following recension of the first eight lines I suppose one line to have been omitted in the archetype between 3 and 5:

Ἀιστηθὶ δούλῃ· Ψύλλα, μέχρι τέο κείσθ' ῥέγγουσα, τὴν δὲ χοῖρον ἀουθῆ δρῦπτει;
ἢ προσμένεις σὺ μέχρις εὖ ἥλιος θάλλει [τὸν θάλαμον; οὐδὲν σοὶ μέλει φῶρ εἰ κλέψει τὸν χρῆ]σον ἐσδύς· κῶς δ' ἄφρυτε κοῦ κἀμνεις
[τὰ πλ]εῖρα κνώσσοι; αἱ δὲ ῥύκτες ἐννέωροι.
[ἄστυθ]ί, φημί, καὶ ἄψον εἰ θέλεις λύχρον
καὶ τὴν] ἄναυλον χοῖρον ἐς νομὴν πέμψον.
[τὸν]θρυζε καὶ κῶς μέχρις εὖ παραστᾶσα
[σὸν δέρ]μα τῷ σκίπωνι μαλθακὸν θῶ. μᾶ, [ῥέγγει μ]έγ· ἄλλ' εἰ καὶ σὺ Λάτμιον κνώσσεις, κ.τ.λ.

I can get no farther than this. In the above, ἄστυθι (6), καὶ τὴν (7), and τόνθρυζε (8), are due to Mr. Kenyon himself. He informs me that the last word has left -θρυζε as a relic rather than -θουζε, as printed in the Addendum. The meaning of the line is "mutter and scratch yourself, until," &c. The reason for supposing a line to have fallen out between 3 and 5 is that θάλλει must have an accusative to govern, and the only accusatives ending in -ῶσον I can think of are χρῆσον and κῶσον. The latter is possible, but very coarse; and θάλλει τὸν χρῆσον would be nonsense. I suppose, then, a line to have been omitted accidentally, owing to the similar terminations of vv. 3 and 4 and beginnings of vv. 4 and 5.

The following conjectures have occurred to me lately:

I. 68. κατακλαίεις] καταπτύεις. π is the only really certain letter in the latter part of the word. Cf. ἐγγελά in l. 77.

I. 73. Read Φιλῶν. An accusative is wanted here. Philinus, as we see from Messrs. Hicks and Paton's Inscriptions of Cos, was a common Coan name.

II. 44, 45.

μη πρὸς τε κῦσος φησι χῶ ταπης ἡμῖν το τοῦ λόγου δὴ τοῦτο λήτης κυρση.

I examined this desperate passage carefully in Mr. Kenyon's company in the British Museum to see if κῦσος showed any signs of being altered from Μυσός (as I see is suggested in the current number of the Classical Review by Mr. Pearson); but the whole line is distinctly as Mr. Kenyon gives it. Still, I cannot but think κῦσος is a corruption, not of Μυσός, but of Μυσοῖς. Then ταπης ought to represent another national name. Now Thales was a Phrygian; one of the towns of Phrygia was Τάβαι, twice mentioned by Strabo. If Τάβαι is properly a plural of a tribal name, Τάβης, I would write the lines thus:

μη πρὸς γε Μυσοῖς, φησι, χῶ Τάβης ἡμῖν τὸ τοῦ λόγου δὴ τοῦτο λήτης κῦρση.

"Lest not only Mysians, as the saying goes, but our Phrygian, win spoil, according to the proverb."

IV. 36. βεβλάσθη.

IV. 38. μη γραφῆς δείσθω.

IV. 47. πανταχῇ δ' ἄρῃ κείσαι: "You are an utter good for nothing."

V. 69. μη τατι ἀλλα νυν μεν αυτον]. This is the most provoking corruption in Herondas, only one letter is missing, and it is difficult to supply that one. I propose μη κτᾶ τι ἀλλὰ νῦν μὲν αὐτόν: "Even now don't be the death of him." Cf. v. 35 and III. 79. The imperative κτᾶ does not occur elsewhere; but I presume the form is not impossible.

V. 85. Mr. Hicks's ἀμέλει is certainly right; but I now hold, with Mr. Kenyon, that there is no promise of a wedding. No; Bitinna promises the branding as soon as the Gerenia are over. Perhaps:

ἔξεις τότ' ἀμέλει τὴν ἐπίσθην ἐξ ἐορτῆς.

Cf. Hesychius = ἐπίσθαι: αὐ μεθόρτοι ἡμέραι, "You shall have a penance after the festival."

VI. 41. δείται]. Read δει τοι: with τί πολλά; or τὰ πολλά for πολλά.

VI. 47. μη ἀνά μοι νεύε: "Don't refuse me."

VI. 73. οὐκ ἀνεύροισ[αν]. The copyist avoided repeating αν, mistaking ἀνεύροισ for ἀν εύροισ.

A. PALMER.

King's College, Cambridge: Dec. 7, 1891.

(1) Undoubtedly, as Mr. Kenyon suggests, this fragment not only belongs to the Έρύπνιον, but follows immediately on the three lines we had before. Adopting from him ἄστυθι and θῶμαι, I would restore thus:

ἢ προσμένεις σὺ μέχρι σευ ἥλιος θάλλει
[τὸν κ]ῶσον ἐσδύς; κῶς δ', ἄφρυτε, κοῦ κἀμνεις
[τὰ πλ]εῖρα κνώσσοι; αἱ δὲ ῥύκτες ἐννέωροι·
[ἄστυθ]ί, φημί, καὶ ἄψον εἰ θέλεις λύχρον.
[καὶ τ]ὸν ἄναυλον χοῖρον ἐς νομὴν πέμψ[ον]
. . . θρυζε καὶ κῶς μέχρι σευ παραστᾶσα
[τὸ βρέ]γμα τῷ σκίπωνι μαλθακὸν θῶμα[ι]
[τᾶχ]υτε, Γαλλί, καὶ σὺ. Λάτμιον κνώσσεις [τὸ κῶ]μα . . .

The use of the form κῶσος here makes it likely that in II. 44 we should read μη πρὸς τε κῦσόν, φησί, . . . Cf. a choliambic fragment in Photius, as emended by Dobree and Bergk (Lyr. fr. adesp. 25):

δ τὸν κῦσόν (κῦσον Phot.) τραθεῖς ἦδεις ἔπου μάλιστα τοῦ κρᾶνους χρεῖη.

To βρέγμα occurs in IV. 51, and again apparently in (9) 1, [τὸ] βρέ[γμα]: which fragment also, I suspect chiefly from r. 6 [ἄν]στυθι, belongs to the Έρύπνιον.

(3) 11. ἀμφικν[ημίους].

(4) 4. Apparently ἴσος, as in III. 93.

(6) 2. γν[ώμη].

[ἦ]μας μεθ' Ἰππῶνακτα τὸν πάλα[σ]θηκε τὰ κύλλα' ἀεῖδεν Εὐοῖδαίς ἐπιούσιον.

τὰ κύλλα' ἀεῖδεν here means "to make choliambics." I will only suggest that this may explain I. 71 (ἀεῖδεν χωλά?).

(8) ἐρρ' ἐκ προ[σώπου] as in fr. 10, where read, perhaps, οὐλῆς κατιθῶ < κόρησθ>.

I may take this opportunity of adding some notes on the fragments already published:

I. 45. καταγύσας.

" 62. καθάρυσσος.

" 81. ὁδὸς πε[ρ]ὶ τῆς. δ. οὐ P. ἡδὸς Nichols: which would not be said by a slave, and seems a δῶρὸς would seem) inappropriate if taken with πειν. Read ΚΑΛΩΣ, "Thank you," as in Theopompus 32, Alexis 111, 230, Menander 292, 1 (Kock).

1. 82. οὐ[νεκ] οὐ θυμοῖ].

III. 62. λῆξον.

V. 85. In the hope that this line may be emended, I may point out that Mr. Hicks's emendation cannot be right. The article is impossible with the phrase ἐορτὴν ἐξ ἐορτῆς, which cannot be definite, as Dr. Rutherford renders it "You shall wed . . . the one feast following on the other," but must mean "one feast after another." Rutherford, again, has nothing to do with wedding, as Dr. Rutherford (followed by Dr. Verrall and Mr. Whibley) takes it, but means "You shall wed." Diels reads ἔμα λιταῖς (he should have written ἔμα λιτῶσιν).

VI. 1. A singularly parallel passage in Plato Stichus i. 2 (58-64), confirms my belief that τῶσθαι are all spoken by Coritto. Read ἀλλὰ τῶσθαι μετρη[ί], "when you have your rations measured out"; and, perhaps, κείσθαι (κείσαι) for αὐ, αὐτῶσθαι, being a phrase used in Theognis 505, Kaibel 551a, Alciphron i. 38, though in all the places of the dead.

VI. 34. τῆ—μᾶ δοκῶν. . . λῆξω (or μοι δοκῶν); epithet being suppressed?

VII. 9. [ὡ Κέρκο]ψ, as a suitable term of abuse

" 15. πυ[ελ]ίδα.

" 63. αἱ κόρες τί βρᾶζουσιν.

WALTER HEADLAM.

NEW LIGHT ON THE EXECUTION OF CHARLES FROM CONTEMPORARY SOURCES.

London: Dec. 5, 1891.

Mr. Thorpe, in his answer to my letter printed in the ACADEMY of September 19, does not quite appreciate my case against the Bloody Court Pamphlet, and I will therefore briefly restate it.

The question at issue is the date of the publication of the undated pamphlet entitled The Bloody Court. Mr. Thorpe argues, from internal evidence, that it was published in May or June, 1649. Against this I showed in my letter of September 19: (1) That thirteen out of a half of the fourteen pages composing The Bloody Court are to be found in a pamphlet published in July, 1651, entitled A Brief Narrative, &c.; (2) That the nature of the verbal differences in the two pamphlets shows that The Bloody Court was published later than the Brief Narrative; (3) That the pseudonym chosen by the author was that adopted by Robert Wild in his popular Iter Boreale in 1660; (4) That the title-page of The Bloody Court consists of a series of phrases extracted from a pamphlet by Gauden, entitled Cromwell's Slaughterhouse, published in 1660. From these facts I infer that The Bloody Court itself was probably published in 1660.

Mr. Thorpe answers my first point by saying that the Brief Narrative is merely an expansion of The Bloody Court; but he does not mention other points at all. It is therefore necessary to add new arguments to show that The Bloody Court was not published in 1649, though it would be easy to do so.

The question of the historical value of the particular statement contained in the Bloody Court it was not my object to discuss. It is not an original authority, for it is copied from another pamphlet; nor is it a contemporary authority (in the strict sense of the term), as the pamphlet it copies was first published in 1660. The value of any statement it contains depends on the view taken of the value of its original authority, the Brief Narrative. Mr. Thorpe, however, is mistaken in supposing that I wished to establish his theory as to "the king's position when . . ."

axe fell." All the evidence tends to show that the king lay down. A French pamphlet in my possession, entitled Relation veritable de la mort barbare et cruelle du Roy d'Angleterre, printed at Paris in 1649, describes the block as "un billot haut du demy pied." On the other hand, the same pamphlet describes Charles as tried by "un juge subalterne, qui s'appelle Kingsbinch." The Bloody Court mixes facts and absurdities in exactly the same fashion and is consequently far more valuable to booksellers than to historians.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "DISMAL."

Cambridge: Dec. 5, 1891.

I cannot see that the remarks by Dr. Chance affect the etymology of the word. At the same time, I am much obliged to him for pointing out that Chaucer probably understood dis-mal to mean "ten evils," for this greatly helps to clear up the passage. But this explanation does not at all suit other passages; and the scribe of the thirteenth century, already quoted, is a much better guide. I cannot really cite over again all the numerous examples which I have collected; most of them are given in my note on l. 1206 of the Boke of the Duchesse in my edition of the Minor Poems of Chaucer. The "evil days" are the Egyptian days, or dies Egyptiaci; and this, no doubt, led Chaucer to explain the phrase in a new way, but still in connexion with Egypt. I think it will appear, when all the evidence is thoroughly sifted, that the explanation by Rauf de Linham is quite correct, and that Chaucer's explanation was due to a natural mistake.

SCIENCE.

THE ETHNOGRAPHY OF THE LETTS IN VITEBSK.

Materiali dlia etnografii Latishkago Plemeni Vitebskoi Gubernii. Sobrali snabdil obiasneniami F. A. Wolter. Chast I. (St. Petersburg.)

BUT little is known about the customs of the Letts to our English folk-lorists, even the most enthusiastic. Here and there stray notices of them may be found, taken mainly from German books; but the interesting volume of Herr Wolter is so full of new material that it has many claims upon our attention. Contributions to the study of Lettish folk-lore have been published as yet chiefly in the literary journals of the Baltic provinces; but two important special works have appeared, that of Sprogis: Pamiatniki latishkago narodnago trochestva, "Specimens of Lettish National Poetry," (Vilna, 1868), where the Lettish songs are given in Russian letters and Yushkevich; Litovskianarodina piesni "Lithuanian Popular Songs" (Kazan, 1880-1882), where Lettish songs are also to be found.

The work of Herr Wolter, of which this is only a first instalment, is systematic. He begins by giving the songs appropriate to the great festivals of the year. There are many celebrations in honour of Usen, who apparently corresponds to the god Ovsen, and is identical with the sun. Ralston, in his Songs of the Russian People, has a good deal to say about this god. The Lithuanians and the Letts have the pretty superstition that the sun dances on Easter Day, but, in order to see him do so, he must be looked at through a worsted handkerchief. English readers will not need to be reminded of the allusion in Suckling's ballad:

"But oh! she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter Day
Is half so fine a sight."

On Midsummer Eve it is better not to sleep, according to the tradition of the Letts, so that the sun dancing at the dawn may be seen. One old man declared that on such an occasion he had beheld the sun changing into various colours—blue, red, and yellow. Whoever has seen it will be happy all the rest of his life. Many of the songs connected with this early worship of the sun are pretty, e.g.:

"Already the sun has set
Into the deep lakes:
The golden oars
On her silver bark have resounded."

The sun—who, by the way, is of the feminine gender in Lettish—is thus spoken of in another song:

"The sun dances
On the silver mountain:
On her feet
She has silver shoes."

Many others of the Lettish customs remind us of the Russians, especially those on St. John's Eve, which have been well described by Ralston. But some of these practices have been greatly modified by ecclesiastical influence. In the autumn season we are told that among the farmers a table is covered with eatables and drinkables. The master of the house hides underneath it, and says: "Do you see me?" To which those present reply: "We do not see thee." Whereupon he answers: "God grant that from the abundance of corn you may not be able to see me this year." The ceremonies of the harvest-home, described on page 88 of Herr Wolter's book, remind us of the English.

The 29th of October was an important day in the Lettish Calendar. At this time they used to invite the souls of the dead from their graves and entertain them. These solemn rites lasted several days, and are described in a curious work by a priest named Einhorn, printed at Riga in 1627. They seem to have begun on Michaelmas Day, and to have continued to that of St. Simon and St. Jude. Besides a curious extract from this writer, Herr Wolter also cites Johann Arnold Brand, a traveller whose work appeared in 1702. We find Einhorn again quoted on page 100, in the description how, on Christmas Eve, the Letts were in the habit of sacrificing a goat to the wolves, by which means they thought that during the ensuing year the wolf would not be able to do any harm to their cattle. The wolf was connected with the lieshi, or hairy man of the woods—a kind of satyr, to be found also in Slavonic folk-lore. Many pages of the work are occupied with Christmas songs, which play so large a part in the popular ritual of all nations.

After having given an account of the several ceremonies and songs belonging to the different periods of the year, Herr Wolter now turns to those which illustrate the three great events of a man's life: his birth, his marriage, and his death. These were originally celebrated with many curious customs; but, as we might expect, they are dying out, in consequence of the growth of towns and their accessibility. It is the same all over the world: the countryman despises rural life and rural habits, when he has become acquainted with urban existence and has learned from the inhabitants of the town "sapiat quid vulva popinae." Hence the rural districts of America are becoming as depopulated as the villages of the mother country.

In the case of the christening songs, Herr Wolter tells us (p. 138) that the priests have succeeded in supplanting the influence of the old heathen gods by that of the Virgin Mary. In one song we are told that Mary has a wonderful silk handkerchief which can wipe away the tears of orphans. This handkerchief is hung out to dry on a bed of nettles, and shines so conspicuously that young men passing by are constrained to take off their hats from pious reverence. There are superstitious customs as to when the child's name is to be mentioned, from the widely-spread opinion that, if you became possessed of the secret of a man's name, you acquired a power over him.

On page 149 we are introduced to the marriage songs and marriage festivals, which have naturally much to interest us. Here there is a great deal of similarity between Lettish and Lithuanian customs, although there are some remarkable differences. Thus, as Herr Wolter says, we find that rue, which among Lithuanians, Malo-Russians, Italians, and other peoples has so much significance as a symbolical flower, is never mentioned in the songs of the Letts. On page 153 we have an interesting comparative list of the words expressing kinship in the Lettish and Lithuanian languages; they are very minute and exact. The ceremony of the capture of the bride is described on page 157, but it does not present any new features. Many of the songs are very pretty, as when the bride is represented saying:

"Tell my mother not to weep for me:
I went away in spring,
When the waters were flowing,
When the trees were covered with leaves."

In Einhorn's time there was a curious omen about the length of wedded life. When the bride and bridegroom were brought together for marriage, two drawn swords were driven into the wall, one over the head of the bridegroom and the other over that of the bride. The person over whose head one of these swords shook for the longest time would live the longest.

When the marriage ceremony takes place the bride must weep; if she shed no tears she will have no happiness afterwards. The April must be in her eyes, to adopt the fine metaphor of Shakspeare: she must also weep when she says good-bye. But, again, we have the old tale. Herr Wolter tells us that the "younger generation assumes a critical attitude towards the old customs of the country, calling them half contemptuously buffooneries and nonsense." Not only town-life is against them, but the Roman Catholic priesthood—and we must remember that the Roman Catholic is the dominant religion, as these districts once formed part of the kingdom of Poland. Fashion is also dead against them. Most of the songs are short, with something proverbial and apothegmatic.

The last part of our author's book is occupied with funeral rites and songs; the latter, he tells us, are scanty in Lettish. The living are guided in their search for the dead by laimi, or sun-maidens, who point out the way by which they have departed. The following lines occur in one of these songs:—

"Who is to die, who to live
In this world?
I saw how they bore on high
My mother;
I called to her: she did not hear;
I hastened to her weeping;
As I hastened I met
Two daughters of the sun."

These mysterious beings conduct the weeping child to the place where her mother is sleeping under a thorn.

The realm of shadows lay in the West, where the sun, moon, and stars set. There is uninterrupted war where the Jodi or souls of dead warriors fight, and the aurora borealis is a manifestation of their encounters. An allusion to this superstition is to be found in the Chronicle of Nestor. There is also the legend of the boat in which the soul departs, and a mythical being, named Ulis, is mentioned, who is connected with death and the grave. In an old work, entitled Visitationes Livonicarum Ecclesiarum factae anno 1613, we are told:

"ubi hoc addendum de praefatis circa defunctos suos, quibus sepeliendis supponunt unum panem capiti tanquam futurae famis post mortem remedium alterum manui imponunt, ut Cerbero afferant ante Paradisum alligato, addentes duos solidos solvendo ei qui eos per flumen transvehat Brumali tempore etiam plaustrum lignorum superimponentes ut anima sese calefacere possit. Per totam Livoniam similiter inveniuntur."

They are said also to have placed a pine torch (luchina) in the hand of the dead, that he should have light in the darkness of the grave. Again, we are told that as soon as the funeral procession set out, one of those present used to kill a fowl and throw it upon the ground. The procession passed over the yet palpitating body of the bird, afterwards they all ate the fowl together. According to the belief of the Letts, the soul of this fowl was changed into a horse for the dead man, to lighten the burden of his long journey, and to be of service to him in the other world. Some of the songs printed by Herr Wolter mention the custom of putting money into the graves.

With these extracts this short notice is closed. It has been impossible to do more than call attention to some parts of this interesting volume. Everything about the Letts and Lithuanians invites our attention. The philology of the Lettish tongue has not been so thoroughly studied as that of its sister language, but it can boast the admirable Grammar of Bielenstein and the Dictionary of Ulmann and Brasche.

Herr Wolter is doing good service by rescuing from oblivion the customs and folk-lore of this interesting people, who are fast losing all their special characteristics under the influence of their more civilised neighbours.

OBITUARY.

PAUL HUNFALVY.

M. PAUL HUNFALVY, the eminent Hungarian philologist, died suddenly of apoplexy early in the morning of Monday, November 30, having received on the previous Saturday the congratulations of the Hungarian Ethnographical Society on his having completed fifty years of membership of the Hungarian Academy.

Hunfalvy was born in 1810 in the village of Nagy-Szalok, in the north of Hungary, of poor parents. After studying at several Protestant schools and colleges, and qualifying himself for practising in the law courts, he was, in 1842, made professor of law at Kezsmark, which position he held till 1848. In that year he was elected to the first Hungarian reformed Parliament, and was one of the minority who voted at Delveezen (April 14, 1849) against Kossuth's declaration that the House of Habsburg had forfeited the crown of Hungary. He had already in 1841 been elected member of the Hungarian Academy, and in 1843 of the Kisfaludy Society. When the revolution had passed over, he lived at Pest as Librarian of the Academy, which post he held till his death. After translating from Greek and doing other literary work, he became absorbed in the study of comparative philology, especially as regards the Hungarian language: founded the Philological Communications, edited the Remains of Reguly, wrote the first books that appeared on the Vogul language, compiled a Finnish Reading-book for the use of Hungarians, &c. Gradually ethnography became his chief interest. In 1876 he published his Ethnography of Hungary, and then became involved in controversies on the origins of the Székels and of the Roumans, on which he wrote several articles in learned periodicals, both German and Hungarian. He was thus led to write History of the Roumans, two volumes of which coming down to the reign of Lewis the Great, he had already completed, when his work was cut short by death. His books have been more than once noticed in the columns of the ACADEMY.

A. J. P.

SIR A. C. RAMSAY, LL.D., F.R.S.

JUST as we are going to press, we hear, with much regret, of the death of Sir Andrew Crombie Ramsay, who for many years was Director-General of the Geological Survey.

He was born in Glasgow in 1814, joined the Survey in 1841, and retired with the honour of knighthood in 1881. Sir Andrew was the author of numerous memoirs, especially on the Geology of Wales and on Glacial Phenomena, but he was best known popularly by his work on The Physical Geology and Geography of Great Britain. Several years ago he retired, through declining health, to his residence at Beaumaris, where his death occurred, after a protracted illness, on Wednesday, December 9.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. W. F. KIRBY'S Synonymic Catalogue of Lepidoptera Heterocera, Part I., Sphingidae and Bombycidae, is nearly through the press; and Messrs. Gurney & Jackson hope to publish it about Christmas time.

AT the meeting of the East India Association on Monday next, December 14, at the Westminster Town Hall, Dr. G. W. Leitner will deliver an address upon "The Races, Religions, and Politics of the Pamir Regions." The day will be taken at 2.30 p.m. by General Sir Richard Meade.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

A PRELIMINARY prospectus has been issued of the tenth International Congress of Orientalists, to be held from September 23 to October 1, 1892. Senor Canovas del Castillo—who is not only prime minister, but also director of the Royal Academy of History—has accepted the office of president; while Senor Ayuso, professor of Sanskrit at the University of Madrid, is organising secretary. In England the two secretaries are Don Pascual de Gayangos and Dr. G. W. Leitner. The subscription is fixed at the low rate of 10s. or 12s. A detailed programme of the learned work to be done will be issued hereafter by the Spanish committee, who are also arranging a series of fêtes and excursions throughout the Madrid towns of Andalusia.

MESSRS. W. H. ALLEN & Co. have in the press a Practical Course of Turkish Studies, by the Rev. Anton Tien, whose qualifications for the task date back to the time when he was interpreter on the staff of Lord Raglan in the Crimea. The work will comprise a practical grammar, exercises, dialogues, progressive selections from the current literature, facsimiles of documents, and a vocabulary of several thousands of words in common use. The Turkish words are transliterated in Roman characters, according to the pronunciation of the polished Osmanli of Constantinople.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday, Nov. 11.) E. W. BRAMROOK, Esq., vice-president, in the chair. The following papers were read:—On "The Petrified Stones of South Africa," by H. Mitford; "An Account of the Similk'ameen Indian Tribe of British Columbia," by Mrs. S. S. Allison; and a tribe at present inhabiting the upper valley the Similk'ameen are immediately descended from a small band of warlike Chilcotins, who established themselves in the upper valley of the river about a hundred and fifty years ago, and intermarried with the Spokans. They have much deteriorated, both physically and mentally, within the last twenty years, and are rapidly becoming extinct. The average stature of the men is about five feet six inches; their frames are lithe and muscular, and their movements quick and graceful. Their complexion is very light, and they have small hands and feet. The colour of their hair varies from jet-black to red-brown, and in some cases it is almost curly. They are born horsemen and capital shots. The sharp horns of the mountain goat were formerly fixed on shafts of hard wood and used as spears both in hunting and warfare: stone knives and hatchets were also used. The summer dwellings of the Similk'ameen Indians were made of mats of cedar bark, manufactured by the Hoop Indians, which were thrown over a circular frame of poles. The winter houses were simply pits dug in the ground and roofed with poles and earth. All sickness was supposed to be the work of an evil spirit, who fastened on a victim and hung on, drawing away his life, until charmed away by the doctor, who worked himself into a state of frenzy, singing and dancing while he was trying to lure the evil spirit from his patient. Many of the medicine-men exercise strong mesmeric power over their patients, and they use several herbs as medicines: their panacea for all ills, however, is the vapour-bath. When an Indian died he was laid out in state on a couch of skins; everything put on the body was new: his bow and arrows were laid at his side, along with his knife. His friends then assembled round him to feast; and when the feast was over his friends advanced, and taking his hand bade him farewell. Immediately after a funeral takes place the encampment is moved, lest the spirit of the deceased should revisit it. A widow or widower is forbidden to eat meat and certain vegetables for a month, and must wear quantities of spruce bush inside their shirts, next the skin. Cannibalism was never known among the Similk'ameens. In the mountain is a certain stone which is muchenerated by the Indians, and it is said that striking it will produce rain. Polygamy was allowed; and if the husband and wife tired of each other, the price of the woman, or its equivalent, was returned by her father or guardian, and the parties were then free to contract another matrimonial alliance: but adultery, though it was generally compromised, was sometimes punished by cutting off the woman's nose or slitting her ears. Occasionally sick persons were buried before they were quite dead, and a good deal of infanticide was practised. The author has not found these Indians to be thieves, and gives them a general good character in other respects.

ELIZABETHAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Dec. 2.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—A paper on "Richard III.," by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, was read. In "Richard III.," the long tragedy of the civil wars which Shakspeare conducted down from Richard II. is closed. It winds up with the vengeance of fate on all those who have torn the heart of their country. Margaret's worn and wasted figure hovers over it, and her curse broods in the air. One by one the guilty— Hastings, Rivers, Vaughan, Buckingham, and Richard; one by one the innocent—the innocent boys, the innocent Elizabeth—are made by Shakspeare to feel her presence in the hour of death and sorrow, and to recognise her, not so much as Margaret, but as the impersonated moral vengeance of the wars that have defiled England with eternal blood. Richard is himself her avenger in his bloody passage to the crown; and having finished this work, he is himself destroyed by the evil he has done. The play turns on the evolution of this idea of the justice of heaven working within law. Secondary to that is the evolution of Richard's character, the main ground which, in Shakspeare's thought, is political intellect, divorced from morality and from love: to put it better, divorced from love, and therefore destitute of morality. Richard alone, because he has no love. The sole representative of conscience in him is that instinct which tells him what is good for himself and evil for himself: and when evil from without falls upon him, it is not repentance that he feels, but the pains of hell, the pains of failure; and it is that which he calls conscience once, at midnight before the battle. The second idea of the play, but the first in importance, comes in with the presence of Margaret; so that the keynote of the play is struck. "Small joy have I in being England's queen," cries Elizabeth. And in the background, like an avenging Fury, Margaret cries, "And lessened be that small, God, I beseech thee." Margaret is a mighty figure, more Greek in conception than any other figure in Shakspeare—the Fate and Fury together of the play. She does nothing for its movement. She is outside its action, but broods above it, with arms outstretched in cursing, an evil bird of God—the impersonation of all the woe and crime of the civil strife of England, and of its avenging punishment. Worn, like "a wrinkled witch," tall, with the habit of command, she has not, like Richard, been inhuman, but she has outlived humanity, and passed into an elemental power. She has also been so long under the curse of men for her cruelty, that the curse has divided her from men. So also has her strange sorrow—she is altogether joyless. It is not till she finds the Duchess of York and Edward's queen in their hopeless pain that she finds herself at one, even for a little, with any human creature. Then she sits down and curses with them, but soon leaves them, as one removed, and curses them, towering over them, angry that she has been at one with them for a moment. It is the most supernatural conception in Shakspeare. Mr. Stopford Brooke gave a careful analysis of the play, and concluded by remarking that Richard perishes like a king, fighting to the last. His death is the death of despair, but as it were greater than despair itself. And the drama closes in that speech of Richmond's, in which the wrong and misery of the civil wars of England is dwelt on, resumed, and absolved in reconciliation.—A discussion followed, which was opened by the chairman, and continued by Mr. James Ernest Baker, Mr. W. H. Cowham, Mr. Chambers, Mr. F. W. Hunt, Mr. W. Rickhards, and other members of the society.

FINE ART.

Illahun, Kahun, and Gurob. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. With Chapters by Prof. Sayce, Canon Hicks, Prof. Mahaffy, F. Ll. Griffith, and F. C. J. Spurrell. (David Nutt.)

UNTIL this present year, when he was unable to bring to England antiquities in sufficient number to form an exhibition, it has been Mr. Petrie's custom to fill a room at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, or a suite of rooms in Oxford Mansion, with the results of his season's work in Egypt. The exhibition has generally preceded the book by something less than a year; and the book, with its numerous illustrations, has placed upon permanent record the history of the objects displayed in the exhibition. The one, in short, has been the complement of the other.

Illahun, Kahun, and Gurob gives us the history of the author's operations in the Fayum during 1890, and covers the ground represented by the interesting collection of objects shown at No. 2, Oxford Mansion, during the months of August and September in that year. It tells of the discovery of the sarcophagus of Usertesen II. in the pyramid of Illahun; the excavation of the necropolis of Illahun; the identification of the long-lost site of the city of Ptolemais; and the final clearance of Kahun and Gurob, two very rich and interesting towns dating respectively from the XIIIth and XVIIIth Egyptian Dynasties, of which Mr. Petrie began the excavation in 1889. The results of his first season at these two last named sites are given in Mr. Petrie's Kahun, Gurob, and Hawara, published last year*—a work which is indispensable to a right understanding of the present volume, but which is unaccountably omitted from the list of the author's books on the leaf following the title-page. As in the case of the preceding volume, the chapters and plates relating to the excavation of Kahun are of extreme interest. Here, for the first time, we have an Egyptian town of remote antiquity brought before us in a condition of preservation almost equal to that of Pompeii—its streets, houses, acropolis, workmen's quarters, boundary and dividing walls yet standing; its larger mansions built, like those of Pompeii, with open courts, impluvia, colonnades, and separate women's apartments; its streets drained, as at Pompeii, by means of stone channels; and, buried amid the ruins of its houses, rich as well as poor, the forgotten or abandoned relics of a population older by nearly three thousand years than that of the wonderful dead city on the Mediterranean shore.

It is the unique characteristic of Kahun that the town was designed and built all at once, and by a single architect. The whole is of one date, the plan is strictly symmetrical, and there has been no rebuilding or expansion as in other places. The town was called into existence for a special object—namely, to give accommodation to the workmen and officials engaged in the construction of the pyramid and funerary temple of Usertesen II.—and when that object had been fulfilled, it was almost, if not entirely, abandoned. It contained barracks for the workmen and spacious dwellings for the overseers and directors of the works. The dimensions of these dwellings were uniform. They measured 138 by 198 feet, and comprised some seventy rooms, halls, and passages, the principal hall being 29 feet square. The roofs of the larger rooms and of the reception halls (which were partly open to the sky) were supported on wooden columns with stone bases, these columns being surmounted by plain brackets, flat abaci, or capitals of the palm leaf pattern. The shafts were mostly octagonal, as at Beni Hasan; but some had sixteen flutings, and some were of the clustered lotus order. All the examples shown in Mr. Petrie's sixth plate were on view last year at Oxford Mansion.

The acropolis, which was not yet discovered when Kahun, Gurob, and Hawara was published, is situated at the north-west corner of the patrician part of the town. It adjoined the great dividing wall which separated this quarter from the closely-packed dwellings of the working population; and (an out-cropping rock having been taken advantage of) the large building on the top dominated all the roofs of the town. This rock is escarped on the east and south sides and faced with a massive retaining wall, while on the west and north the ground slopes down to the general level. A single doorway, guarded by a doorkeeper's lodge, gave access to the acropolis at the south-east corner, whence three flights of brick steps led to various parts of the great mansion which occupied the summit. This mansion was of precisely the same dimensions as the large houses below; but it was more richly decorated as well as more jealously guarded, and Mr. Petrie is doubtless justified in assuming it to have been, if not exactly a royal palace, at all events, the mansion occupied by Usertesen II. when paying his visits of inspection during the building of his pyramid and temple. Some of the pillared chambers in this mansion were adorned with brilliantly painted dados, of which many fragments were found. The acropolis, owing to its exposed position, appears to have suffered more from denudation than the rest of the town; and the ruins of the king's house had so blocked and buried all the passages and walls, that it looked like a mere sandy hill before the excavations were begun. Ten foot deep of rubbish was removed before the character of the building could be determined.

At the back of every large house in Kahun has been found what Mr. Petrie describes as "a compact mass of store-rooms," in which to keep the corn, oil, wine, salted geese and fish, and such other provisions as were commonly laid up for use in the offices of an ancient Egyptian mansion.

The workmen's quarter of Kahun was excavated in the course of Mr. Petrie's first season at this place, and is described in his preceding volume. It was separated from the aristocratic quarter by the great dividing wall before mentioned, there being no communication whatever between the two. It was, in fact, a kind of Ghetto, entered by a single gateway and guarded by a porter's lodge. The houses, moreover, were symmetrically ranged in narrow alleys running east and west, each alley opening upon a central passage running from south to north. A watchman traversing that passage commanded, therefore, an uninterrupted view of every street. Here, under the debris of fallen roofs and drifted sand, Mr. Petrie disinterred those chisels, bow-drills, adzes, hoes, rakes, sickles, plasterers' floats, mallets, whorls, rude toys, and rough household ware, which were by far the most interesting objects in his exhibition of 1889. So also in the patrician quarter on the other side of the dividing wall, he last year found the precious alabaster vessels, the delicate carvings in ivory and wood, the jewellery, the scarabs, the bronze mirrors, and other dainty possessions of the high officials who dwelt in the more recently excavated mansions of the upper town. Thus the whole life of the past is brought before us with a vivid completeness even greater than at Pompeii, which was an aristocratic watering place with no working man's Ghetto, and yielding few relics of his pathetic existence.

The main problem arising out of the first year's excavations at Kahun and Gurob has meanwhile been emphasised by the second season's work. More potsherds inscribed with characters closely resembling, or identical with, certain letters of the Phenician, Cypriote, Graeco-Asiatic, and Etruscan alphabets have been discovered at Kahun. More pottery of Phenician, Cypriote, and Aegean types; more weights corresponding with the Attic, Aeginetan, and Phenician standards, have turned up on both sites.* Of forty-five weights found by Mr. Petrie at Kahun during the two seasons (1889 and 1890), only seven are Egyptian; of thirty-two found during the two seasons at Gurob, only twelve are Egyptian; and in both instances the native minority are wrought in soft materials—limestone, sandstone, alabaster, and lead—such as were not used for that purpose by native Egyptians. No more interments of fair-haired and fair-skinned mummies have been brought to light at Gurob, it is true; but some fresh evidence has turned up to prove the existence of two colonies of these strangers in the Fayum at two widely separate periods—the earlier settlement at Kahun being dated to the reign of Usertesen II., fourth Pharaoh of the XIIIth Dynasty, and the later covering about a century under the latter half of the XVIIIth and the first half of the XIXth Dynasties. At Gurob, for instance, there prevailed a very singular custom or rite, which was certainly non-Egyptian, and which is best described in Mr. Petrie's own words:

"In many instances the floor of a room has been taken up; a hole about two feet across and a foot deep was dug in the ground. A large quantity of distinctly personal property, such as clothing, a stool, a mirror, necklaces, kohl-tubes, and toilet vases of stone and pottery were thrown in, and then all were burnt in the hole. The fire was smothered by potsherds laid flat over it, and lastly the floor was relaid. It is evident that the objects thus buried are such as belong to an individual personally, and not to a household. No bones were ever found with the burnt deposits. These were not, therefore, funereal pyres. Yet we cannot imagine a general custom of burning and burying valuable property, except on the death of the owner. I conclude, therefore, that there was a custom among the foreign residents of burying the body in the Egyptian fashion, especially as I found light-haired bodies in the cemetery; and that the personal property which would have been burned on the funereal pyre in the Mediterranean home of the Akhaians was here sacrificed in the house, and so put out of sight. In most instances Aegean pottery was found in these deposits, an evidence of their belonging to the foreigners" (p. 16).

Those who visited Mr. Petrie's exhibition last year at Oxford Mansion will remember the numerous groups of charred and blackened objects from these Gurob houses, which were among the most interesting in the large room. I may here mention that the custom of burning the personal relics of a dead member of the family—such as the clothes, and especially the chair or stool—prevails, I believe, to this day among certain tribes of gipsies.

Among other small objects of foreign design found at Gurob, may be noted a pair of alabaster cups, roughly engraved with groups of dancing goats, which, as Mr. Petrie observes, "recalls the style of Greek island gems;" and also three very curious articles, pin-shaped, with a central hole, which are identical in pattern with others found in Cypriote tombs, but unknown till now in Egypt.

* See "Excavations in the Fayum," by W. M. F. Petrie. ACADEMY, July 20, 1889.

"It has been proposed," says Mr. Petrie, "that they were used by being tied on to one edge of a garment by the middle hole, and then slipped through a small hole on the opposite edge, and drawn back like the swivel of a watch-guard; this seems the most likely explanation" (p. 19).

Want of space forbids me to go further into the mass of similar evidence—especially the evidence of the pottery—which Mr. Petrie brings to bear upon this important and deeply interesting question of the foreigners of Kahun and Gurob; but to me it seems to be conclusive. The more conclusive it is, however, the more perplexing it becomes. To find traces of a Graeco-Asiatic tribe in Egypt so early as the times of Thothmes III. and Rameses II.—that is to say, some fifteen or fourteen centuries before our era—would be wonderful enough; but also to find traces of such a tribe living and working in the midst of a native population of the time of Usertesen II., some twelve or thirteen centuries earlier still, is yet more amazing. If accepted as a proven fact, this last conclusion carries back the history of the archaic forefathers of the Greek nations to a date hitherto undreamed of as the starting-point of their civilisation. It shows them to have been manufacturing their special styles of pottery, buying and selling upon the basis of their own systems of metrology, and even making use of what would appear to be the rudimentary characters of their own alphabets at a time when, if we had thought of them at all, we should have pictured them as mere barbarian tribes hunting, fishing, fighting, and probably living in caves, like the rude ancestors of other nations. Nor does the wonder end here. We cannot but ask ourselves how and when these strangers came to the Valley of the Nile, and what brought them to Kahun? Were they descended from the "Hanebu,"* conquered by King Sankhara of the preceding Dynasty, and had they preserved the traditions of Aegean crafts throughout the intervening generations? Were they brought thither from some other Egyptian town because of their skill in those foreign crafts, and because their labour was prized by the architect of the royal works? Were they there as a subject race, useful but despised; or as recognised experts and equals? Did they live only in the workmen's quarter, or were some of them high officials dwelling in the fine houses of the upper town? Future discoveries in other parts of Egypt may settle these questions, to which at present it is impossible to reply. In the meanwhile it is equally impossible to deny the distinctively Greek character of the domestic architecture of Kahun, as shown in Mr. Petrie's plans and illustrations. It is a style of which the tomb-paintings furnish no example. The "restored Hall" in Plate xvi. (No. 3), with its twelve columns, impluvium, and tank, might stand for a restoration of the atrium of the house of Sallust or Cornelius Rufus at Pompeii.

* "Hanebu" was the name by which the Greeks are designated in Egyptian documents from the time of the XIth Dynasty to the time of the Ptolemies. The word is susceptible of two translations, and may be read as "the people of all shores" (meaning the folk of the isles and coasts), or as "the Lords of the North." Mr. Petrie adopts the latter version.

The barrel roof of a stately chamber, represented in a wall-painting of one of the isolated mansions at Kahun (Plate xvi., No. 4), recalls the roof of the Tepidarium in the Men's Baths at Pompeii; and the forms of the columns by which it is supported are, as Mr. Petrie points out, unlike any Egyptian columns yet known. Again, and this is perhaps the most important point of all—we have here, for the first time, an ancient Egyptian town with an acropolis, like Troy, or Tiryns, or Mykenae. Reviewing these facts, one is almost tempted to ask whether the architect who planned the town of Kahun may not himself have been of the tribe of the foreigners?

These are but a few of the many questions raised by Illahun, Kahun, and Gurob. What became of this race of strangers during the centuries which intervene before they reappear at Gurob we cannot even guess; but that they were scattered over the country at various dates seems to be coming dimly into view. At Tell Kataaneh, in 1885, M. Naville found pottery of a curiously Etruscan type, and some large oval urns containing ashes, pieces of charcoal, and bones, some of which were undoubtedly the bones of animals, while others, he thought, might possibly be human. These were in a necropolis of the XIIIth Dynasty. At Tell Nebesheh, in the same year, barrel-roofed structures were found which might possibly have been used as dwellings before they were used as tombs; and in one part of the same Tell, Mr. Petrie discovered a necropolis of Cypriote mercenaries of the time of the XXVIth Dynasty, Cypriote pottery and weapons being buried with the dead. And this very year, 1891, in the course of his excavations at the site of Heracleopolis Magna (Ahnas-el-Medinet), M. Naville has disinterred one perfect vase of Cypriote ware and decoration, which is now in the British Museum.

I have dwelt at such length upon the Kahun and Gurob problem that I have no space in which to do more than indicate the great interest of Mr. Petrie's chapters on Illahun, the Tomb of Maket, the identification of Ptolemais, and of his account of the mounds which he visited in the Fayum. Mr. F. C. J. Spurrell devotes a chapter to the flint implements of Kahun; Prof. A. H. Sayce and Prof. J. P. Mahaffy contribute translations and descriptions of the Greek documents found by the author at Gurob; and Mr. F. Ll. Griffith, who is engaged on a systematic catalogue of the wonderful store of hieratic papyri of the XIIth Dynasty found in Kahun, gives a tantalising foretaste of the legal and official writings, the scientific treatises, the literary and religious fragments, of which facsimiles are hereafter to be published.

AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

WOULD that the New English Art Club—which represents, so pleasantly at all events, one side of the contemporary movement in art—could hold possession of that generally depressing Dudley Gallery until well after Christmas! As it is, it is to be feared that possession must be yielded up just before the recurrence of that season at which the world endeavours to be merry to order—which is another way of saying that the student of artistic matters has not very much time to loose if he means to form, and has not formed already, any opinion of the New English Art Club's present exhibition.

One or two exceptional circumstances, as well as the presence of what is considered a high average among the works of the members, make the exhibition certainly deserving of a careful visit. These circumstances—which provide an additional attraction—are the presence of what I take to be important loans of the works of MM. Degas and Claude Monet, and the presence of two canvasses of Mr. Sargent's, which are more "important" than those he has been wont to contribute. The Degas is an extraordinarily clever vision of a rehearsal of a ballet—a picture which we greatly admire, and of which we have nothing to say that is amiss, save that in its preoccupation with the securing of movement, character, and vivid illumination, there has been little opportunity for the exercise of "selection"—more particularly in regard to the type of damsel whom it has pleased M. Degas to put into the foreground. There is hardly anything pretty, hardly anything graceful; but at the bidding of an unattractive gentleman of full middle age certain graceless girls scatter, with angular arms uplifted, across the garish stage. I like the work. I recognise the truth of observation and the brilliance of portrayal; and to the opponents of such work I should defend it most heartily. But in the calm of meditation—or addressing ourselves perhaps to those artists who see in it the fulfilment of every artistic dream—it is permitted to form a doubt as to whether it is quite all that is claimed for it. Be that as it may, M. Degas—as, indeed, I have been saying for the last dozen years—is nothing less than a great personality, an initiator, an originator, a force to be counted with. The two Monets, which witness to a range in this painter's art, which some might hardly have suspected, are each worth careful notice. One of them is of very remarkable refinement and reticence. Mr. Sargent's canvasses are, first, a study of a Javanese dancing girl, whom it was the painter's privilege to meet in the Paris Exhibition, as I hear. In portraying her, with her skin stained of canary colour, with her raiment of green and orange and peacock blue, the painter has revelled in a difficult exercise in hues easily discordant, and has enjoyed likewise the presentation of momentary action. His other picture is an elaborate exercise in draughtsmanship. A naked Egyptian or Nubian, seen from behind, has engaged, with her suppleness, with her slenderness of bony structure, the resources of his art in this matter. This study of life, like the other study of colour, displays a fine capacity, and affords no hint of the existence of a chastened and exquisite taste—such a taste (am I permitted to add?) as Mr. Sargent, ever brilliant and forcible, and ever immediately striking, would presumably despise.

In the present place I cannot do much more than indicate generally the remaining contents of a show that engages attention, and that is the production, with scarcely an exception, of intelligent artists who are possessed of a faith, and who can give some justification for the faith that is in them. People who, at previous exhibitions of the Club—as well as at his own exhibition—must have noticed the drawings in which Mr. Francis James caught the very soul of a flower, its most fragile and fleeting life, will be surprised very likely to see him this year chronicling, with fidelity and with infinite and obvious pains, the form, colour, expression, of certain painted statues that defy time and escape, for the most part, the hurried gaze of the modern traveller in the niches of their church in an old-world German town. Mr. Sidney Starr, together with the portrait of a much-discussed surgeon—which does not interest us—sends a young woman's portrait, which evidences at once dignity both on the part of the sitter and on the part of the painter. One is attracted by that effervescence of vitality in Mr. Walter Sickert's portrait of the author of A Mummer's Wife. Movement and colour are arrested very happily in Mr. Wilson Steer's two visions of the coast, called respectively "White Wings" and "Ermine Sea." There is style in Mr. Barber's "Garden" and in Mr. Maclure Hamilton's "Despair." Mr. Mark Fisher has something of his own—something, too, that is fortunately his best—to say in "A Hampshire Dairy Farm." The realism of Mr. Clausen's little figure, notwithstanding its orange hair, is sufficiently obvious. The thing is wrought cleverly, and one allows oneself to like it. As realistic—but perhaps a better subject for pure realism—are Mr. Otto Scholderer's "Peaches"; while a more poetic refinement reigns in Mr. Christie's "Ice Floes on the Thames," in Mr. Maitland's vision of Chelsea reach, in Mr. Arthur Tomson's "Marshland," in Mr. Brabazon's delightful sketch on Lago Maggiore, and in Mr. Theodore Roussel's "Sea after Sunset," which depicts a moment and an atmosphere of rare quietude at the Pier End at Brighton.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. W. SALT BRASSINGTON is preparing to issue, through Messrs. Sampson Low, to subscribers only, a quarto containing twenty-four photogravure plates, representing two dozen of the finest book-bindings in the Bodleian Library. In the introduction, special attention will be paid to the history of the art of book-binding in England; and every illustration will be accompanied by a description. Three of the bindings to be reproduced are in carved ivory; one is in transparent enamel on silver; four are in embroidery of various periods; and the rest are in leather, one of these being from the famous collection of Diane de Poitiers, and another from the library of De Thou. Only 150 copies will be printed.

THE annual distribution of prizes to the students of the Royal Academy was to take place on Thursday of this week at 9 p.m. The galleries containing the competition works are open to the public during the two following days.

AT the meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday next, December 16, at 8 p.m., General Pitt Rivers, the collector and donor of the museum at Oxford which bears his name, will deliver a lecture on "Typological Museums," with special reference to that collection.

AN exhibition of furniture of an exceptional character will be opened next week in Bernard's Inn Hall. The exhibitors are Messrs. Kenton and Company—a small band of architects and others, who have associated together with the object of supplying furniture of good design and the best workmanship. All their work is designed by themselves, and made under their personal guidance. No machinery is used; but each piece of furniture is made entirely by one workman, and is stamped with his initials.

MESSRS. MARCUS WARD & Co. have sent us a bountiful selection of their new issue of Christmas and New Year Cards. We cannot affirm that they present any great originality; nor are we at all sure that such originality is to be desired. As compared with some others we have seen, it is enough to say that the figure groups, the landscapes, the comic scenes, and the decorative designs all alike show graceful drawing, and admirable reproduction in colour—which, we are glad to know, is the work of English (or Irish) handicraftsmen. It seems also worthy of note that the publishers have not been neglectful, in regard to the size of their pictures, of the necessary requirements of the Post Office.

MUSIC.

OPERA AND CONCERTS.

"DER BARBIER VON BAGDAD," a Comic Opera, by C. A. P. Cornelius, was performed for the first time in England at the Savoy Theatre by the pupils of the Royal College of Music. The composer (b. 1824, d. 1874), nephew of P. J. Cornelius, the distinguished painter, was a friend and admirer both of Wagner and Liszt. Through the influence of the latter, his opera was brought out at Weimar in 1858; it failed, and Liszt, indignant, left the town soon afterwards. It needs but a slight acquaintance with musical history to know that failure is no criterion as to the value of a work. One feels, indeed, inclined to say that failure is the avenue which leads to the temple of fame. The "Barber of Bagdad" is a work brimful of true musical feeling, cleverness, and humour. The book, of which the composer was author, is, if not strong, at any rate highly diverting. There is a spontaneity about the music quite captivating; and, while displaying to a large extent the influence of Weber, Wagner, and also Berlioz, it has a character of its own. The opera is written more or less on "Wagner" lines, but the lines are hidden by the individuality which pervades the whole work. The composer draws from his audience a genuine laugh at the expense of Italian opera: barber Aboul is shaving Noureddeen, and chattering after the manner of barbers. Suddenly he leaves his customer, and, advancing to the footlights, indulges in a cadenza of apparently interminable length, to the detriment of the action, and to the discomfort of poor Noureddeen, into whose eyes soap-suds are falling. This is an excellent companion picture to the "Amen" parody in Berlioz's "Faust." Aboul is the central figure in the story, and the part was best rendered by Mr. Charles J. Magrath. His acting was never—or hardly ever—extravagant; but by appearing serious himself, he was the cause of mirth in others. Miss Una H. Bruckshaw was good as Margiana, though the upper notes in her voice were somewhat harsh. Mr. William Green acted well as Noureddeen, but in the matter of quality of tone and purity of intonation he was not satisfactory. The concerted music in the second act shows great ability, and the singing of Aboul in the street brings him into relationship,—though distant—with Beckmesser. Miss Pattie Hughes proved a sprightly Bostana. The orchestra played extremely well under the direction of Prof. Villers Stanford, and the orchestration throughout is an important and attractive feature of the opera. The mounting of the piece was excellent. The theatre was filled, and at the close there was much applause. The opera is to be repeated next week. The directors of the Royal College of Music deserve the thanks of the public for calling attention to a neglected work.

The brilliant performance by Lady Hallé of Vieuxtemps' Adagio and Rondo from his violin Concerto, Op. 11, was an attractive feature of Sir C. Hallé's second orchestral concert last Friday week. The lady made her first appearance in London since her return from Australia, and her reception was most cordial. Sir Charles, with his orchestra, gave an admirable rendering of the instrumental portion of Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet"; and of this French composer's music, pregnant with life and colour, he is evidently an enthusiastic admirer. It was a pity that he did not produce the whole work, and thus have given still more point and meaning to the numbers selected. The programme included Beethoven's "Leonora," No. 3, a graceful Serenade by Saint-Saëns, and two movements from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The concert was a great success, and better attended than the first.

The centenary of Mozart's death was duly celebrated in different parts of London last Saturday. As compared with the sister arts, music is yet in its infancy; and the marked changes in tonality, form, colour, and, indeed, intention, which took place during the eighteenth century, have told with disastrous effect even on composers of the seventeenth century whose names occupy an important place in musical history. It is therefore well to hold in honour as long as possible the name of the illustrious Salzburg master. Bach, the key-stone of the old, the foundation stone of the new style, together with his great contemporary Handel, are the only composers before Mozart's time who exert any real influence on modern musical art. At the Crystal Palace the "Requiem" and the "Jupiter" Symphony were the principal features in a programme specially devoted to Mozart's music; and at Mr. Barnby's concert in the evening at the Albert Hall the same two works were chosen. The latter is one of Mozart's noblest efforts in the department of instrumental music; but the former, written as his life was ebbing away and moreover unfinished, though it contains fine thoughts, is not one of the works which has secured for him immortality. Still, the fact that it was the composer's last work, and that in its origin it has an element of romance, will sufficiently account for its selection. No good purpose would be served by comparing in detail the two performances of the "Requiem;" both Mr. Manns and Mr. Barnby displayed zeal and intelligence. The Palace orchestra naturally rendered fuller justice to the instrumental, and the Albert Hall choir fuller justice to the vocal music. Neither rendering of the work was, however, above reproach. Mr. Manns conducted the "Jupiter" Symphony in his best manner; and Mr. Henschel, who directed the same in the evening also distinguished himself. The Palace programme included the solemn Adagio, "Maurische Tränen-Musik" for orchestra, and the "Magic Flute" Overture. The solo vocalists were Miss A. Williams, Miss Marian McKenna, and Messrs. H. Piercy and Norman Salmond. At the Albert Hall the "Requiem" soloists were Mrs. Henschel, Mme. Patey, and Messrs. Lloyd and Mills. Mr. Lloyd sang the Aria, "Misero, O Sogno," with great effect and the choir gave a splendid rendering of the grand chorus "Godhead, throned in power eternal," from "King Thamos."

Mr. Chappell also celebrated the centenary on Saturday afternoon. With the Director in B flat for strings and horns, the pianoforte Fantasia and Sonata in C minor, and other familiar pieces, instrumental and vocal, and with Sir Charles and Lady Hallé, Mr. Santley, and Messrs. Ries, Straus, Whitehouse, Paersch, and Praetoni, he gave full satisfaction to a crowded audience.

The Westminster Orchestral Society gave their first concert of the season on Wednesday evening. The programme included Dr. Bridge's Ballad for male voices and orchestra, "The Festival" (poem by Archbishop Trench), a spirited work with effective dramatic touches. The chorus of students from the Westminster Training College sang in a creditable manner. Dr. Bridge conducted, and was well received. A pianoforte Concerto by Dr. Horton Allis was well played by Miss E. Nun; the first movement with its "English" theme is the best of the four. The orchestra has materially improved. Mr. S. Macpherson conducted as usual.

NOTES

describing the Emblems, the Poetical Associations, and other thoughts and subjects employed in the Decoration of the ware, an Account of the Festivals, and of some of the Customs of Japan.

By JAMES L. BOWES.
 Imperial 8vo, cloth, 600 pp., with Plates, £2 12s. 6d.
 "Extra Illustrated Edition," half-morocco, gilt top, £6 6s. (Only a few copies left.)

Non-Mail.—"It is a noble book... a book of the most valuable and fine character. It is evident that Mr. Bowes has brought together a representative collection, and that he has made every specimen the object of careful research and intelligent scrutiny."
Telegraph.—"Few are entitled to speak with absolute authority of these Mr. Bowes stands foremost. Virtually a complete encyclopedia of the art. To the true connoisseur it needs little recommendation."

Academy.—"Produced with singular care and completeness... a worthy sequel to the author's previous labours in the cause of new art."

Times.—"Worthy of its subject and its author."
Art Journal.—"Remarkably free from mistakes."

Spectator Review.—"Let us repeat our admiration of Mr. Bowes' titillating and enticing volume."

Architect.—"A guide for the collector, and the best of its kind."

Builder.—"Not only one of the most beautiful, but one of the most useful and rational books upon Japanese art which has been published in England."

Notes and Queries.—"To collectors his books are as authoritative as the lover of Elzevirs the priceless book of Mr. Willems."
James's Gazette.—"The volume is one in which the connoisseur might delight."

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

I.

by Mrs. Campbell Praed.
The ROMANCE of a CHALET

By the Author of "Policy and Passion," "Nadine," "Miss Jacobsen's Chance," &c. 2 vols.

[At all Libraries.

"... the writer has succeeded in not only interesting us in her story, but in gaining our sympathy for every one's conflicting complexities, and some of the scenes are graphic and natural."—Saturday Review.

"Mrs. Campbell Praed is, as both her descriptive and her dialogue passages attest, an admirable artist in words... an author with the best delightful faculty for the setting down of pleasant things."

County Gentleman.

"... when once the authoress gets into the swing of the narrative, she makes rapid headway, and holds the attention of the reader to the end... it contains some good character-drawing, and it is, in fact, one of the most successful efforts of the writer."—Court Circular.

"Mrs. Campbell Praed's society stories are always bright and readable... she contrives to interlard her theme with so many bright etches of character and pretty bits of description that the story comes pleasant reading enough. Such is the case with her latest novel, 'The Romance of a Chalet,' in which the tragic conditions are lightened by smart little sketches of familiar types... The chalet, rich is the scene of the romance, is in the Swiss Alps, and the tourage of her principal characters enables the author to give her clear some quaint and pretty studies of Swiss peasantry and Alpine scenery, as well as a plot full of the human interest which should be a first consideration in the production of a romance."—Court Journal.

"The tale is strongly conceived and cleverly told."—Scotman.

by Mrs. Robert Jocelyn.
DRAWN BLANK.

By the Author of "The Criton Hunt Mystery," "The M.F.H.'s Daughter," "£100,000 versus Ghosts," &c. 3 vols.

[At all Libraries.

"The accomplished author of 'The M.F.H.'s Daughter,' has produced another excellent novel, which may be read with a great deal of ease... The story is always interesting. It is full of incident, and here is more than one situation that indicates a fine appreciation on the part of the author of dramatic incident and effect."—Scotman.

"... is a bright, readable bit of work, full of smart dialogue and dolent of that open-air life which the author evidently loves so well. The story is never dull, and the reader who takes it up may do so without the faintest anticipation of possible boredom; for the author ever preaches, and such story as she has to tell, she tells in a frank, unswerving fashion."—Court Journal.

"The leading characteristics of this novel are a bright vivacious style and an intimate acquaintance with hunting matters... its althly vigour renders its perusal a distinct pleasure."—Publishers' Circular.

IV.

by Hawley Smart.
BEATRICE and BENEDICK:

A ROMANCE OF THE CRIMEA.

By the Author of "Long Odds," "The Plunger," "The Outsider," &c. 2 vols. [At all Libraries.

"Captain Hawley Smart has seldom done better work than 'Beatrice and Benedick'... We have seldom read anything better of its kind than the scene between Tom Byng and the false Zorava, who turned out to be a Russian spy in disguise... The Crimean scenes are, indeed, charged throughout with a realistic vigour worthy of the highest rank. We know not where to look for a more spirited account of the king of the quarries and other incidents of the famous siege."—County Gentleman.

V.

by Mrs. Edward Kennard.
THAT PRETTY LITTLE HORSE-BREAKER.

By the Author of "The Girl in the Brown Habit," "Killed in the Open," &c. 3 vols.

[At all Libraries.

"... it is a pleasant and wholesome story... is very readable."

"Mrs. Edward Kennard has caught much of the late Whyteville's spirit in her hunting stories. There is the same breezy atmosphere and the same healthful, invigorating tone about them... he takes us through many exciting episodes in the field, but these by no means exhaust the interest of her novel. It presents us, in addition, with some faithful pictures of English life as led in what is called society, as well as outside that charmed circle."—Academy.

Notes of Lectures to serve as a Popular Commentary. By Rev. CHARLES WATSON, D.D. Crown 8vo, price 7s. 6d.

"Since Kingsley's 'Sermons' we have had no such pellucidly simple English. As a popular commentary on 'First John' nothing better can be desired. The commentator has caught the spirit of his author."—Dr. Marcus Dods, in the British Weekly.

TALES FROM SPENSER, CHOSEN FROM THE FAERIE QUEENE.

By SOPHIA H. MACLEHOSE. SECOND EDITION.

Fcap. 8vo, ornamental cloth, gilt top, price 3s. 6d.

"'Tales from Spenser' is a delightful book for children. The allegory is properly ignored, comment there is none, and the writer narrates the fascinating legends of Una, Florimell, Pastorella, and so forth, with admirable fidelity and sympathy, in a style that is both simple and elegant. The book could not have been better executed had it been the work of the Lambs."—Saturday Review, December 21, 1889.

THE THOUGHTS of MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS.

Translated, with Notes, Biographical Sketch, and Introductory Essay, by GEORGE LONG, M.A. New Edition, printed at the Chiswick Press, on Hand-made Paper, and bound in buckram, post 8vo, 6s. [Large-paper Edition out of print.] "Few care to read Marcus Aurelius in the original, and few would profit by doing so. A DICTIONARY of QUOTATIONS from the ENGLISH POETS. By the late HENRY GEORGE BOHN. Fifth Edition. Small post 8vo, 735 pp., 6s. "Mr. Bohn's volume has the rare recommendation of being entirely free from the rubbish which is commonly thrust into similar collections. His selections have been made from a long and extensive course of reading, and it everywhere bears evidence of a scholar's eye and taste. There must be, as we judge, nearly 8,000 quotations in the volume, ranging from Chaucer to Tennyson."—Times.

SHAKESPEARE'S DRAMATIC WORKS.

Edited by S. W. SINGER. With Vignette Half-Title to each Play. In 10 vols., 2s. 6d. each; or half-morocco, 5s.

This edition of Shakespeare, uniform with the Cheap Edition of the Aldine Poets, and printed in clear, readable type, is specially suited for the use of Members of Reading Societies, and all who wish to secure handiness of size without sacrificing legibility of text. The cheapness of the volumes places a recognised and scholar-like edition, well printed and neatly bound, within the reach of every one.

"The late Mr. Singer's notes are of well-known excellence, learned but not pedantic, suggestive and informing without becoming trivial or intrusive... He is no rash or lavish corrector of the text, though on occasion he is not found wanting. His chief service is his illustrations, and the charm of these is their freshness and variety. He draws water for himself straight from Elizabethan fountains—does not borrow it from his neighbour's cistern. Each play has 'Preliminary Remarks,' dealing with the date and material, and like matters. The type of the text is of careful size. Altogether this is a capital edition of its sort."—Prof. J. W. HALL.

LITERATURE.

The Franco-German War of 1870. By Field Marshal Von Moltke. Translated by Clara Bell and Henry W. Fischer. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

UNFORTUNATELY, I do not understand German; and I am forced to examine this work of Moltke through the medium of a translation condemned as exceedingly bad by very high authority. Yet it is not difficult to form a judgment on this account of the war of 1870 from the pen of the principal actor in it, though I am not versed in the author's language. The book is not to be placed in the rank of histories; and we need not expect to find in it dramatic pictures of battles and sieges, or even one of those artistic narratives which combines events in a well ordered sequence, and sets them forth in their true perspective. It is not one of profound criticism, of elaborate reviews of the tactics and strategy of the great conflict between France and Germany, of deductions to be drawn in the art of war from Worth, Gravelotte, Sedan, or the Siege of Paris. The object of Moltke has not been to imitate the descriptions of Livy and Caesar, or to write commentaries like those of Napoleon; it has simply been to make a good abridgment—succinct, exact, and fit for the general reader—of the official account, by the Prussian staff, of the memorable struggle of twenty years ago; and his performance, therefore, is not meant to be a military work of a high order. Considering it, as we ought, from this point of view, it has real and evident merits, though it disappoints the true student of war, and it has no claim to the extravagant praise lavished on it by the herd of Moltke's flatterers. It is a clear, compendious, and useful précis of the military events of 1870, as they appear in the eyes of the Prussian staff, or, rather, as they have been described by it; it is not overlaid with the minute details, which obscure and injure the original work; and if the conclusions the author draws are few, they are, in some instances, weighty and just. The book, however, is by no means an adequate, fair, or correct epitome of the war, even in a narrow aspect; and, taken as a whole, it is very misleading. With reference to the first part of the contest, it contains statements opposed to the evidence; it abounds in omissions and suppressions; and it keeps considerations out of sight which should have been placed in the fullest prominence. These faults, nevertheless, only reach a climax when we come to the second part of the war; the narrative here is not trustworthy, and it often conveys most untrue impressions. In order to conceal his false conception of the power of France to withstand invasion after the ruin of the Imperial armies, and to hide the results which flowed from it, Moltke has kept back facts of supreme importance, has misrepresented large parts of the case, has taken care not to dwell on the accidents to which his final triumph was largely due, and describes the contest as a mere trial of strength between disciplined armies and rude levies, the issue of which was at no time doubtful. Yet even this is not his worst error: Moltke has no perception of the moral grandeur of the heroic national defence of France; he studiously withholds the unquestionable fact that it put the severest strain on the power of Germany, and made the result uncertain for months; he will not see how immense have been the effects, even from a mere military point of view, for Germany will think twice and thrice before she attempts again to advance to the Loire. This wilful blindness was perhaps, indeed, to be looked for in the case of a soldier who inherits the traditions of Jena, when Prussia thought discretion the better part of valour, and succumbed without a show of resistance; but it is rather too much to describe Gambetta as little better than a fou furieux and Bazaine—an intriguer of the worst kind—as, on the whole, a more judicious patriot.

I can only glance at a few points in this narrative. Moltke dwells on the want of preparation in France, and on the perfect arrangements of Prussia for war; but he is wholly free from conceit and vanity, the most attractive side of his character; and he does not allude to his own organising powers, the one sphere of the art in which he was a great master. He has not, however, as he ought to have done, compared the numbers of the opposing armies: to have fairly set forth the weakness of France in the field, and to have shown the immense superiority of the Germans in force, would not please the military pride of Prussia. He takes care to point out how the three German armies were well combined at the outset of the campaign; he did not repeat the march into Bohemia, one of the worst operations of modern war, and that succeeded only through the gross faults of Benedek, though lately compared by a courtier of fortune to the immortal contest of 1796. He leads us, however, rather to infer that Steinmetz, no friend of his, was exposed on the right; and this confirms the view of one very able writer, that had the miserable display of Saarbruck been followed by a French advance in force, the invaders might have suffered a defeat. Moltke again studiously avoids numbers in his short account of the Battle of Worth; but the French were 45,000 to nearly 100,000 men, and kept the Germans at bay for hours, a result honourable alike to soldiers and chiefs, but largely due, too, to faulty German tactics. He describes Spicheren at greater length, and admits that the attack was premature; he also dwells on the unquestionable fact that Frossard would have been very superior in force had he been supported, as should have been the case;

but he ought to have pointed out fully the mistake of Kameke, by no means excused by partial success. He fairly allows that, after these engagements, the German commanders lost touch of the enemy, and does not conceal the extreme slowness of the German advance from the Saar to the Moselle. All this may have been judicious caution; but, wretched as the movements of the French were, it gave them ample time to retreat, and it strikingly contrasts with the conquering march of Napoleon, with whom Moltke has been absurdly compared. Moltke hints again that Steinmetz laid himself open to a dangerous attack on August 14, and it is remarkable that the ill-fated Bazaine, only just given the chief command at Metz, is evidently of the same opinion. These volumes fairly describe the movement of the German armies across the Moselle; and Moltke does not conceal the fact that Bazaine, on August 16, might have opposed 130,000 to about 60,000 men, the result of a distinct German mistake. Moltke believes that the Marshal was even then intent chiefly on clinging to Metz. He does only justice to the fierce courage and steadiness of the Germans at Mars la Tour—they had now acquired the moral power of victory; but he will not acknowledge, what is, however, true, that had Bazaine been a real general he would have swept his assailants from his path, and made good his retreat to Verdun, completely discomfiting Moltke's projects. The most remarkable omission in this part of the work is, however, the author's studious reticence on the grand opportunity given to Bazaine by the advance of the Germans beyond the Moselle. French, Austrian, German, and English writers have maintained that, had the Marshal fallen back on Metz, and issued from the fortress in force on the 17th, advancing between Strasburg and Nancy, he ought to have cut the German communications in two, and probably changed the course of the war; and General Hamley has worked out the problem, with his usual ability, in his great work. Moltke, however, absolutely ignores these comments; it would not do to confess that the Prussian staff had fallen into a strategic error, and had afforded their enemy a great strategic chance.

Moltke dwells at some length on the great day of Gravelotte, evidently because, with the exception of Sedan, a disaster rather than an equal fight, it was the only battle, in the first part of the war, arranged beforehand on both sides. His account, however, is indistinct and partial; and in one main particular it is thoroughly untrue, at least it is contradicted by all the authorities. He does not conceal the singular fact that, though the enemy was not distant, the German commanders had lost touch of the French, and were disposed to think they were retreating northwards, though they were quite ready to attack Bazaine. Nor does he attempt to deny that a great mistake was made in assailing the French centre, supposed to be the extreme right—a mistake which disproves the boasted perfection of German reconnoitring in all instances and which caused the assailants enormous loss. Very properly, too, he remarks that Bazaine, who, clinging to Metz, whatever the cost, had massed far too large a force on his left, ought to have placed the Guard on his right, though he does not admit, what is nevertheless true, that had the Marshal made this arrangement the battle must have been at least drawn. But Moltke keeps out of sight the extreme slowness and long delays of the German advance, which made the turning movement that proved decisive hours too late, and nearly a failure; he does not point out how the German army was practically divided into two distinct masses, which would have given Bazaine a great chance had he been anything like a capable chief; although he refers to the heavy loss of Steinmetz, he does not acknowledge that the German right was well beaten, and very nearly routed. He screens, in fact, the tactical errors and ill-connected movements of the German leaders—operations which, as in the case of Sadowa, would have made the result of the battle different had Moltke had an adversary of any worth or skill. The capital fault of this account, however, is the author's statement of the numbers on both sides. All the known evidence refutes his figures; and it is difficult not to believe that Moltke has enormously underrated the force of the Germans, and enormously overrated the force of the French, in order to excuse the mistakes of Gravelotte. He says that "the seven German corps" which "faced the French were exactly 178,818 strong," but if this is the truth, it is not the whole truth; he does not take in the Second German Corps, which reached the field late, but joined in the fight; nor yet a part of the First German Army, which shelled Metz from the eastern bank of the Moselle, and kept the Imperial Guard on the spot. In fact, the Germans who took part in the battle were from 210,000 to 220,000 men, according to every other estimate. Moltke's figures as to the French are even more deceptive: he asserts that "180,000 men were engaged"; and he bases his calculation on the assumed fact that, when Metz surrendered, at the close of October, there were 173,000 prisoners of war. This reference, however, is wholly incorrect: the garrison of Metz, the sick and wounded, and a large contingent of Gardes Mobiles, in all probably 60,000 or 65,000 men, are included in the 173,000; and the error is palpable, if not wilful. The Prussian staff, it should be observed, reckons the French at Gravelotte to have been "from 125,000 to 150,000 men"; Bazaine makes the numbers 100,000 only; and the most accurate estimate is about 120,000. General Hamley—not a blind worshipper of success—asserts that "the French were outnumbered more than two to one"; and beyond all question the Germans had an overwhelming superiority of force.

These volumes describe the advance of the Third German Army, and of the newly formed Army of the Meuse, after the investment of Metz by Prince Frederick Charles—a move which Bazaine could have made disastrous had he not been half incapable and half a traitor. Moltke follows, with a kind of grim humour, the march of the Army of Chalons to the Meuse—the fly going into the web of the spider; and he justly dwells on the wretched weakness and false sense of honour shown by Macmahon in undertaking a movement he believed ruinous. It is most creditable to Moltke that he has no self praise for his masterly direction of the German armies against their imperilled and rash enemy: in this grand modesty he resembles Wellington; but this operation, and the march against Bourbaki's army at the close of the second part of the war, prove that Moltke is a real chief of the great school of Napoleon. It is idle, however, to compare the advance on Sedan to the advance on Ulm, as displaying equal genius and power: it is one thing to move an army to a given point, a few leagues, on a narrow front; and quite another to move an army, from Brittany and Hanover, for hundreds of miles, and to make it converge on a far distant spot. The comparison, indeed, would not have been thought of, but that, as Sedan was "a bigger thing" than Ulm, it has been described as a greater achievement by more than one of Moltke's blind eulogists, a test which would make Attila and Zinghis Khan superior to Hannibal or Napoleon. Of the battle of Sedan it is needless to speak; the French army, over-matched and desperate, was simply forced into a trap and destroyed; and, though we remember Arcole and the Beresina, grand feats of arms which subdued fortune, a disaster could not, probably, have been averted. Yet it would have been better to have tried to escape to Mezières, or even to have broken out towards Carignan, than to have waited on the spot, to be crushed and surrounded; and how far the fatal result was due to squabbles between Ducrot and De Wimpffen—that besetting sin of the warriors of France—or to the French tactics of passive defence, the bad system adopted in 1870, can be matter only of mere conjecture. Moltke does not examine the most important question whether Macmahon could have made his way to Mezières, had he abandoned his worst troops and his heavy material before noon on the 31st of August, and made boldly a forced march from Sedan; but good judges have thought that this was possible; and Moltke, we believe, was not confident that he had his enemy in the toils until the close of the day. Moltke points out that on the 1st of September, when the German armies had gathered round Sedan, the attempt would have almost certainly failed; but this is so evident that we incline to think that either he or his translators have written the 1st of September for the 31st of August.

Moltke's account of the second part of the war deserves, I have said, severe criticism. The narrative is sedate and colourless; but it is not the less a studied apology for the German operations after Sedan, and a censure of the national defence of France; and it is not trustworthy in either instance. Moltke boldly takes the bull by the horns, and insists that he was perfectly right in advancing on Paris without a secure base, and with not more than 150,000 men; but, notwithstanding his ultimate success, history will pronounce this a great strategic error. There was no necessity for this hazardous course. The Germans could have held Lorraine and Alsace, and defied all the efforts of France, without running enormous risks; for months after the investment of Paris they were in a situation of the gravest peril; and their final triumph was rather due to accidents, and the mistakes of their foes, than to their own strength, though strained to the utmost, and to the skill of their leaders in war. Moltke, in fact, utterly underrated the capacity of France to withstand the invaders; and, in order to conceal the results of this error, he keeps back facts of supreme importance, and misdescribes the course of the contest. He cannot deny, indeed, that, seven weeks after Sedan, Paris, though besieged, had within her ramparts from 300,000 to 400,000 armed men; that Gambetta was setting armies on foot which became at last 600,000 strong; that the Germans round Paris were very weak; that Prince Frederick Charles was bound to Metz, confronted by a still powerful enemy; and that, had as the levies of France were, the nation had made a gigantic effort. But he hides many of the results of this position of affairs; and never points out how doubtful was the issue of the struggle for a long time, and what caused France at last to succumb. He does not even allude to what has been accepted as an unquestionable fact, that, after Coulmiers, he prepared to raise the siege of Paris, so critical was the situation of the besieging army. He takes care not to say that, but for the fall of Metz owing to the negligence and misconduct of Bazaine—a godsend on which he had no right to reckon, for the fortress ought to have held out much longer—D'Aurelle would probably have reached Versailles and the war would have taken a different turn. He suppresses the fact that it was found necessary enormously to reinforce the German armies—it is said by 150,000 men—his miscalculations had been so great, and the resistance of France so unexpected and mighty. Above all, he does not point out that it was the fatal misdirection of Bourbaki's army, at the supreme moment, that caused the war to end—a mere accident he could not have foreseen. Had Chanzy controlled the whole military power of France, the catastrophe of Pontarlier would not have occurred, and the struggle would have gone on for months, with what consequences no one can tell.

On the other hand, Moltke misrepresents the effects, and even the nature, of the defence of France. He condescends, forsooth, to say a word for Chanzy; but he does not do justice to that great chief's exploits, nor does he his best to reduce their importance. Yet the stand made by Chanzy after the defeats at Orleans, his daring movement against the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg, and his admirable retreat from the Loire to the Sarthe, for a time paralysed the German armies. And Moltke will not tell us that even after Le Mans, Chanzy had good hopes of the fortunes of France; that had Gambetta followed his counsels, the relief of Paris was by no means impossible; that this illustrious warrior—no boaster—insisted, up to the last moment, that France could save herself if she would fight to the uttermost. Chanzy was the real hero.

the second part of the war; he very nearly changed the course of events; and, as I have said, he might have wholly changed it had he been an absolute general-in-chief. All this Moltke simply disregards; he is not less unfair, besides, to Faidherbe, who really gained a battle at Bapaume, and held the invaders at bay in the north; and he describes the contest as a mere succession of scenes in which rude levies are easily routed by disciplined armies inferior in numbers. This is simply a caricature of the truth; but the worst feature of the book has yet to be noticed. Moltke cannot understand, or will not set forth, the true character of the defence of France, and he treats it as if it were a hopeless struggle in which she vainly suffered enormous losses. This callous cynicism would equally scorn Rome after Cannae, Spain at Saguntum, Washington at Valley Forge, Russia after Moscow: it is shallow and ignoble alike; and it proves that Moltke has no claim to some of the qualities that make up greatness. France, as a matter of fact, more nearly succeeded than those who look only at results suppose; but the importance of her heroic resistance is not to be judged by success or failure. It was not in vain that Chanzy showed himself to be the Du Guesclin of the national defence; that legions rose from the earth at the summons of France; that peasant and peer, men of art and trade, stood up to fight for the natal soil, though they did not drive the invaders beyond the Rhine. By her magnificent efforts France effaced the ignominy of Metz and Sedan; she redeemed, nay more than redeemed, her honour: she proved that her sons were not degenerate; she vindicated her right to that glorious heritage, her high place among the nations of the world. As I have said, too, even if we consider the subject from the narrowest point of view, and look at material facts only, France has gained immensely by her grand resistance. It is improbable, in the very highest degree, that a German army will ever attempt to make a rash advance on Paris again.

Jerusalem: its History and Hope. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Macmillans.)

MRS. OLIPHANT will pardon the lovers of that "ideal Truth" in whose name, as she tells us herself (Introd., p. xiv.), "so many lies are accumulated," if they decline to attach great significance to her indignant scorn for the only methods by which the sealed book of Biblical antiquity can be opened. She has evidently not read the works of the critics whom she derides, except, indeed, those of M. Renan (that "ape of genius"); and her habits of mind are, one fears, so inaccurate that it would be in vain for her to read any except those of a somewhat popular character. But I feel sure that if she had met with such a vivid and imaginative reconstruction of the times of the Isaiahs as Mr. George Adam Smith has presented, she would, in a fit of noble discontent, have cancelled at least one of the chapters in this volume. In fact, the antithesis which Mrs. Oliphant imagines does not exist. M. Renan himself is not such a purblind critic as she believes, and could have quickened her imagination as she studied the times of Jeremiah; nor am I without a fancy that, in spite of its humble exterior, my own "combined effort of criticism and imagination" (which preceded M. Renan's second volume), could have helped the author to do better justice to one of the most fascinating characters of Bible history. Yes, Mrs. Oliphant, you will find, on reading more attentively, that the breath of Shelley's life-giving West Wind has passed upon more of the critics than you suppose; and their chief complaint of you will be, not that you seek to comprehend the Bible by the imagination, but that you hinder your own success through your wayward opposition to knowledge. In short, the mental and moral physiognomy of the men of the Bible, and that movement of ideas which is one of the highest interests of the Bible, are obscured to Mrs. Oliphant for want of a suitable historical training.

Discriminating friends of the author will, therefore, buy this handsome and well-illustrated volume, partly for its picturesque descriptions and partly for the pleasant glimpses which it opens of a simple but ardent nature. She has returned from Palestine unchanged; she has but gained some illustrations of the surface of Bible-narratives. But these illustrations are, so far as they go, vivid. The hand which limned the portrait and surroundings of Irving and of St. Francis has not wholly lost its cunning. How excellent is the reproduction of the story of Nabal, "a true Eastern romance," and of David's two (?) noble acts of generosity to Saul! And how well is the chivalrous side of the hero-king's character brought out in these words, referring to 2 Sam. xxiii. 14—17:

"They forced their passage through the night, through a hundred deaths, like Knights of the Round Table, like followers of Robert Bruce or Cœur de Lion. The entire tale is pure chivalry, worthy of the age in which such sheer devotion was the ideal of the spotless character. And like the high hero of the poet's dream, the Arthur who never was by sea or shore, David whom we all discuss with so many disparagements, the ambitious, the schemer, the voluptuary—David received this proof of supreme devotion like the prince and poet he was" (p. 80).

I do not know if it be true that "we all," or most of us, think disparagingly of David. Secularists may do so; and lovers of Hellenism, like Mr. Myers, may congratulate Hellas on having had far higher and nobler heroes. But upon the whole, the idealistic tendency has always been strong enough, though seldom is it carried to such a really beautiful extreme as it was by the subject of Mrs. Oliphant's greatest biography—Edward Irving. Perhaps it may not be uninteresting to the eloquent writer to know that one whom she scorns too much (see p. 382) to read accurately has ready for press a defence of David from the critical point of view, combined with popular sketches of those still greater Davids, whose ideal of character was so much nearer to the Christian, the Psalmists.

Very vivid, too, is the description of the building of the Temple, and of the "expeditions on the Sabbath days" to see its progress (p. 139). Nor can the much maligned critic abstain from expressing some pleasure that Mrs. Oliphant is against the spiritualisation of the "fervent strophes" of the Song of Songs, though she does think it possible to assign it (and Ecclesiastes, too!) to the great despot. Why poor Frederick Robertson should be so contemptuously treated in this connexion one fails to see. To many readers his sermon on the Illusions of Life has been one of his most instructive writings. The chapter on the Kings presents few features of special interest; but even here note the fine description of pre-Exilic sacred song, which may suggest a doubt whether our extant Psalms can have been adapted to such singers. Passing over Isaiah, let us not omit to read the fine passage on "Jeremiah's Lamentations" (p. 285), so truly poetical, and yet, if my own view be correct (Jeremiah, p. 180), so impossible and really so unworthy of Jeremiah. In the Ezekiel chapter, let us note the fine passage on the "doomed ship" Jerusalem (p. 294), and the equally fine conclusion (p. 313). After this, Mrs. Oliphant has to compete with Mr. Hunter (on the Persian age) and Prof. Church (on the Maccabees); and on the great Jewish uprising against Syria M. Renan may before long throw the author hopelessly into the shade. Nor can I help thinking that, by his picturesque descriptions and devout sympathy with the narratives, Archdeacon Farrar has made Mrs. Oliphant's New Testament chapters almost superfluous. Only, as one who is interested in the autobiographic aspect of books, I may confess that there are certain pages in the concluding chapters which I would not willingly have missed. It is well that there should be some naively devout persons in our most highly educated class to keep the tone of society fresh and pure, and in the best, though not necessarily in the most orthodox, sense Christian.

T. K. CHEYNE.

Annals of my Early Life, 1806-1846. By Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews and Fellow of Winchester College. (Longmans.)

THOSE who read this interesting autobiography of a remarkable man, will do well to bear in mind its title. Viewed as a work complete in itself, it might easily seem ill-balanced and out of proportion; viewed as an instalment, it is of vivid interest and ought to bespeak an attentive hearing for the sequel, which (see p. 336) may be expected shortly, and which promises to deal with the writer's life in Scotland.

The venerable Bishop of St. Andrews was born in 1806, and has written this autobiography in his eighty-fourth year. He has enjoyed not only a grande mortalis ævi spatium, but one of peculiar interest. Son of one who became Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, he was himself an Oxonian, entering Christ Church in 1825 as a commoner, after a school life spent at Harrow. At Harrow, at Oxford, and at Cambridge, he seems to have known every one that was worth knowing—he reckons among his private pupils Mr. Gladstone, Cardinal Manning, Sir Francis Doyle, Bishop Hamilton of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Acland, "Clemency" Canning, and Mr. James R. Hope, afterwards Mr. Hope-Scott of Abbotsford. With Lord Selborne he has had a lasting friendship; with Dr. Pusey and Cardinal Newman his acquaintance seems to have been slight, though he quotes friendly letters (pp. 325, 328) from each of them. With his uncle the poet he was not only well acquainted, as was natural, but he was actually present at Abbotsford on the evening of the day when "Yarrow" had been "revisited" by his uncle under the guidance of Sir Walter Scott. Turning to matters of lesser import, though perhaps of keener interest at the time, we find that he played in the first inter-University cricket match (in 1827), and rowed in the first inter-University boat race, his double relation to the two Universities contributing in no small degree to bring about those friendly rivalries. Then followed foreign travel: visits to Norway and Sweden, Denmark, North Germany, and Saxony. The description, in particular, of his Norwegian experiences, and of the charming hospitality of Provost Hertzberg, of Ullensvang, is delightfully written: amid some thousands of the Bishop's Latin verses that enrich the volume, the Alcaic Ode (pp. 135-7) to his reverend host at Ullensvang strikes me as brilliantly good. During these travels he learnt to dance,

"first at Berlin, then at Dresden, and ultimately at Paris . . . with the result that, a few years after this, on an occasion which I well remember—a Domum ball at Winchester—I caused quite a sensation; and this, not only by the perfection of the saltatory movements which I displayed—doubtless beyond all expectation—but still more perhaps by the determination which I announced not to dance with any lady except my wife! I had thought it my duty to be present at the ball in question (as it was given by the Winchester boys); and, being present, I could not resist the temptation of letting the company see what a charming wife I had, and how I could exhibit her to the best advantage."

To which, with a charming candour, the Bishop adds a footnote, "It ought to be mentioned, perhaps, that I was not then in priest's orders!"

At Berlin, he attended the lectures of Böckh, Neander, Schleiermacher, and Bekker; of the last-mentioned as lecturer, he gives a most uninviting account.

"It was distressing and melancholy," he says, "to see a man of European reputation exhibit himself to so little advantage, and to find him apparently without honour in his own country. . . . He had the character of being remarkably reserved and taciturn; so that as he was known to be a great linguist, it was commonly said of him that he held his tongue in ten languages!"

So Moltke inherited this compliment from Bekker, it would seem. From one trait in the Bishop's description (p. 145) of Neander, one would say that he must have sat for his portrait to Browning in "Christmas Eve."

A subsequent continental tour, in 1834, led the traveller οκοθεν οικαδε, from home to a new home. He met his future wife in the Louvre, the wife whose epitaph has touched a thousand hearts:

"I, nimium dilecta, vocat Deus; I, bona nostrae Pars animae: maerens altera, disce sequi."

I certainly shall not dwell further on this part of the autobiography, save to say that the English verses, grave and gay (pp. 158-168), to which the occasion gave rise are among the best things of their kind that I have ever read. The engagement led to a change of plan. The Second Mastership at Winchester, then, according to the Bishop, "worth some £1400 a year with some perquisites," was "a most desirable one," especially to a young scholar just engaged to be married; but it had "never been held by any but a Wykehamist," and a long and strong pull, on the part of his friends, was needed to promote the election of an Harrovian, however distinguished. On his array of testimonials the Bishop dwells with a pardonable pride (p. 171), which in the "advertisement" (p. x.) he fears may be held egotistical. Judicious readers, I think, will not take that view; but there is, undoubtedly, throughout the book a certain forgetfulness of the fact that the testimonials of intimate friends, however gratifying, have little comparative value. One needs to know, really, what one's enemies, or impartial spectators, think. Of any other egotism than this I do not see much in the book; even the greatest triumphs are chronicled with nothing but thankfulness and gratitude, and a sort of Miltonic candour, as of one always "in his great Taskmaster's eye."

To the honour and advantage of Winchester, he was elected Second Master—which post he held from 1835 to the close of 1845. From this point the autobiography becomes of more limited and local interest. Influence of a most powerful sort was brought to bear on that section of the school over which he presided—the college boys. One considerable reform, with which the pages of Tom Brown have familiarised all readers as regards Rugby, was carried through by Mr. Wordsworth at Winchester, and remains associated with his name to this day. But the outside world will hardly realise from the pages of this autobiography the full effect of his personality on the generation over which he presided. In intellectual things and in athletics, as well as in religious reform, he took so prominent a part that he seems conscious himself (p. 260) that his restless energy sometimes led him near to trespassing on the functions of others.

Inseparably connected with this part of his career are his labours to improve the teaching of Greek grammar to English boys. An elaborate description (pp. 177-196) of the enterprise which resulted in "Wordsworth's Greek Grammar" may be read with pleasure and profit, yet not without a sigh. Here, and here alone, I think, do old disappointments and annoyances rankle, or, at any rate, revive, in the Bishop's mind. The "Eton Grammar" was holding the field; though, at Charterhouse and elsewhere, rivals had some existence. But the defects of the Eton Grammar were undeniable, and, practically, undenied even in its supposed birthplace (see pp. 194-5); and when research demonstrated the fact (p. 185) that the Eton Grammar was really born at Westminster, the Bishop seems to have thought that his own better Grammar, which was warmly welcomed elsewhere by men like Arnold and Drury, would secure permanence by being adopted at Eton likewise. But Dr. Hawtrey, in letters of graceful but cautious courtesy, "did not consider it consistent with his position to accept of any book for use at Eton over which he, as head master, could not exercise absolute and entire control"; to which position he adhered. Further, if the Bishop is correctly informed, an article on the new Grammar, written by the late Bishop of Lincoln for the Quarterly, and actually in type, was excluded by Lockhart, under pressure from Hawtrey and other Etonians (p. 185)—it is supposed, because the revelation of the Westminster origin of the Eton Grammar gave offence to Etonian feeling. There must, one would imagine, be another side to this odd and not very commendable piece of scholastic history. But the question of a uniform Grammar seems destined to set successive generations of schoolmasters at variance. It is curious to observe that the subsequent supersession of the Bishop's own Grammar (p. 196) is characterised in turn by the Bishop as "backsliding": so difficult is it to realise that, even in the grammatical sense, Tempora mutantur.

It will, I think, be regretted by all readers that one so admirably qualified as the Bishop to sketch the general University life of sixty years ago, has apparently turned from the task. He has given, it is true, in a postscript (pp. 337-356), his own view of the Oxford Movement, which he must be said to have seen rather from an outside point of view. To him, the Movement "was from the first too much in the hands of young men." Had it been guided, he thinks, by more cautious hands, more in the spirit of those who issued the "Anglo-Catholic Library"; had it been "carried on upon fixed and well-defined lines—strictly consistent with the principles of the Reformation—the result would have been different." That much may be admitted by all men: the disruption described by Dean Church might, no doubt, have been avoided. But Newman—of whom the Bishop speaks uniformly in terms of admiring forbearance and kindness—was not the sort of power that could be discounted or reduced to a secondary influence. Following the λόγος, like Socrates, whithersoever it seemed to lead him, he earned before he died the unstinted admiration of those least inclined to follow the path which he adopted with loyal reluctance, and pursued with single-hearted fidelity. Nor does it seem quite fair (p. 346-7) to ascribe to defects in the Movement which he led, the relics of old abuses (such as "fining undergraduates a guinea for absence from the Communion"), which he had done much to supersede, but which nevertheless survived his presence in Oxford.

However this may be, one cannot read this half of an autobiography without a feeling that "there were giants in the earth in those days." The intellectual and phys-cal energy of the Bishop's early career is marvellous; the life was lived on a level of the highest intellectual, moral, and social interest; the Latin verses, sown broadcast, perhaps too plentifully, over these pages, show a man to whom Latin must be a second native tongue. May the day be distant when we shall have to use the past tense, instead of the present, in speaking of Bishop Wordsworth of St. Andrews!

My Mission to Abyssinia. By Gerald H. Portal, H.B.M. Agent and Consul-General at Zanzibar. (Edward Arnold.)

WE welcome with much satisfaction Mr. Gerald Portal's narrative of his mission to the court of Abyssinia in 1887. On his return to England in the following year, he printed, for private circulation, an account of his adventures, and a more formal record appeared in a blue-book; but till now there has been no generally acceptable narrative of this important and interesting expedition.

Mr. Portal's mission had its origin in the intrusion of the Italians into the country on the shore of the Red Sea, abandoned by the Egyptians in 1884, to which the Abyssinians had set up a claim—a claim as shadowy as that of the children of Ammon to the coasts of Arnon. Still, there was this to be said for them in their contest with the Italians, that at least some hundred years before the territory of Massowah had formed part of Abyssinia, whereas the Italians had no pretence of any right whatever except that of conquest. The seizure of this country by the Italians naturally led to war with Abyssinia. The Italians were defeated at Kofit, and a detachment of 480 Italian soldiers were annihilated at Dogali. It was then suggested that Her Majesty, as being the only European sovereign who could be said to exercise any influence over Abyssinia, should intervene with a view of bringing about a pacification. To this the government of Lord Salisbury acceded; and Mr. Portal was instructed to carry to King Johannis or the Negoos (for he is called sometimes by one name and sometimes by the other) the conditions on which the Italian Government would make peace, together with letters from the Queen, expressing her earnest hope that the king would agree to the terms offered by Italy.

The difficulties in Mr. Portal's way were very great: first, the journey through a country totally devoid of roads and in a measure hostile—encumbered, too, as he was with the heavy and bulky presents which he had to convey from the Queen to the Negoos, and which had to be carried on the backs of mules; and last, but not least, the proposed terms themselves. These were so onerous that it was from the beginning almost certain that King Johannis would not agree to them, and there was real danger to be apprehended from his indignation at being invited to yield without further contest to an invader against whom he had hitherto been successful. The journey was also required to be made with the utmost celerity; for, although Mr. Portal did not receive his instructions at Massowah till November 1, the Italians only undertook to suspend further hostilities till early in December. He was not a man to be frightened by the prospect of danger or difficulties; rather they would, in his eyes, add zest to the expedition. He was accompanied by two excellent travelling companions—his servant Hutchisson and Mr. Beech, a veterinary surgeon in the Egyptian army. It was at the very outset of the expedition, indeed on the first day of the start, November 2, that the most thrilling of all their adventures occurred. We will neither anticipate nor spoil the reader's interest by any description of it here; it will suffice to remark that it was caused entirely by the treachery of the guides and mule-drivers furnished by the Italian authorities at Massowah. Mr. Portal had remarked before starting that he had never seen such arrant blackguards, but was told no others were obtainable. Nevertheless, after the harm was done, other trustworthy men were forthcoming. We are, therefore, justified in attributing the risk of failure, the acute sufferings of the party, and the death of the wretched Ahmed Fehmy, to the carelessness and indifference of the Italian authorities at Massowah.

Mr. Portal describes his journey, his difficulties with the truculent Ras Alula, his reception by and his negotiations with the king, and his escape from Abyssinia, exceedingly well. In spite of all the opposition he met with and the difficulties and hindrances they were always placing in his way, he has a liking for the Abyssinians.

"No one," he writes, "who has had any acquaintance with the Abyssinians can deny their desperate bravery. Thieves and liars, brutal, savage, and untrustworthy they are by nature; but these evil national characteristics are to a great extent redeemed by the possession of unbounded courage, by a disregard of death, and by a national pride which leads them to look down with genuine contempt on every human being who has not had the good fortune to be born an Abyssinian. It may be thought that we ourselves had but little cause to love the Abyssinians as a race; but, although no doubt we were at times in somewhat difficult situations and subjected to certain inconveniences during our journey, yet we met with many little acts of genuine hospitality and kindness in the villages through which we passed, and I do not think that there was one of our party who would not be glad to have another chance of making a visit to the rich valleys and towering mountains which are inhabited by the extraordinarily handsome, active, and chivalrous race of mountaineers at present ruled over by Johannis, king of the kings of Ethiopia."

This was written before the death of the king, the invasion of the Mahdi, and the convulsions which ended in the proclamation of the Italian Protectorate over Abyssinia. The author, in a final chapter, gives a brief summary of these events.

We can safely recommend Mr. Portal's book to all classes of readers, and cannot imagine anyone who will not be interested in it. He has much to tell and he tells it well. Now that the Italians have established themselves at Asmara and made military roads over the mountains, whose steep and slippery sides offered such impediments to Mr. Portal's party, we shall probably be flooded with books of travels in Abyssinia, equally egotistical and equally diffuse. Mr. Portal's book is the last on old Abyssinia, the Abyssinia of Father Lobo, of Bruce, and of Lord Napier. It is a pity a better and clearer map is not provided; but that is not the fault of the author. Of the illustrations the best is the frontispiece, representing Mr. Portal in the full dress of honour presented to him by King Johannis; and uncommonly well he looks in it.

A Schoolmaster's Chat. By Orbilius. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

In spite of a good deal of slipshod writing, grammatical inaccuracy, and other mistakes apparently due to mere haste and carelessness, A Fatal Silence has a fair claim to be ranked among the best of Miss Marryat's novels. That favourite and occasionally delightful author has a perplexing variety in her choice of subject-matter, which makes it impossible to conjecture beforehand what her next production will be like. She has been known to portray certain grades of society with an acrimony less suggestive of good-humoured caricature than of personal bitterness; while the mystic and supernatural have such an attraction for her, that one is apt to await with dismal foreboding an introduction of that pestilential element with the opening of every fresh chapter. There is all the more pleasure, therefore, in welcoming a story which is totally free from any such unwelcome features, and which exhibits Miss Marryat at her freshest and best. Her tale is only about a village schoolmistress, who marries a wealthy gentleman farmer, in the erroneous belief that her first husband is dead; but it is charmingly told. The writer has never been happier or more humorous than in the first volume, where she describes the vulgar persecution to which Miss Stafford, the schoolmistress, is subjected at the hands of Gribble, the unctuous churchwarden of the parish, and his colleague Mr. Axworthy, with the full co-operation of their respective wives. Miss Stafford's flight from the village under the pressure of scandalous imputations, and her subsequent return to it as the wife of Hal Rushton, the chief landowner of the place, give opportunity for some capital situations as the tale proceeds. A more pathetic element prevails throughout the last volume, but there is nothing mournful in the termination.

A time may possibly come—but we seem to be rather far from it at present—when novelists will begin to recognise the fact that ordinary mortals do not talk to one another in essays occupying several minutes in delivery, and expressed in carefully balanced periods of faultless syntactical arrangement. Surely the author of Marriage up to Date cannot have seriously hoped to make us believe that Miss Helen Marshall, a mere worldly-minded, wide-awake young woman of the Becky Sharp order, ever addressed her lover as follows :

“Man’s credulity is generally feigned after he has left school. His seraphic innocence generally flits long before his legal infancy is terminated; but vast numbers of unsophisticated women are continually falling victims to the deceptions and wiles of your sex. A handsome face and an oily tongue in a man can achieve more evil than any feminine blandishments,” &c., &c.

Again, there is Mrs. Cyrus-Ludlow, a simple minded, uneducated woman, who is described in the opening chapter as adopting “juvenile mannerisms, a swinging step, and a girlish mode of attire,” and who commits such gaucheries as desiring to be driven to the “Hôtel de Demi-Monde” on arriving at Paris; yet in the third volume she is found discoursing at length in sustained arguments of incontestable logic. Considering the popularity which French fiction has obtained among us, one can hardly understand the reason why our novelists have not long ago recognised the immense superiority it possesses as regards the construction of dialogue, and have not endeavoured—in an almost literal sense—to take a leaf out of our neighbour’s book. If Mr. Kevill-Davies will take the trouble to compare an ordinary chapter of, say the elder Dumas, with one of his own chapters, he will see where the difference lies. We have pressed this point at some length, because it really is the only severe bit of criticism that deserves to be passed upon the book. Marriage up to Date exhibits an exceedingly clear insight into many phases of modern social life; as a story it is well-constructed; it is full of surprises and dramatic incidents; and the mystery which runs through it is guarded much more successfully than in ordinary works of this kind. Nor can much fault be found with the portraiture. Mr. Cyrus-Ludlow, the vulgar American parvenu and millionaire, whose sole ambition is to obtain a footing for himself and his family in London society, is perhaps an easy enough character to draw, and lacks originality; but several people we meet are decidedly amusing—as, for instance, Lady Mary Sharplet, who, having secured a rich banker for her husband, at once proceeds to suppress any demonstrations of affection he may wish to exhibit towards her, as being fit only for domestic servants. In short, Mr. Kevill-Davies’ work exhibits some of the best constituent elements of the society novel, and might with judicious treatment have taken a deservedly high place as a work of fiction.

From Harvest to Haytime is not by any means a badly written book; and the plot would have passed as fairly original had not the author explained in a prefatory notice that, at the moment of going to press, her attention had been called to a story dealing with circumstances somewhat similar. Rose Purley, eldest daughter of the widowed mistress of a large farm, is the presiding genius and mainstay of her mother’s establishment, and a general enslaver of hearts, including that of the local doctor. A way-side tramp, to whom she had given food and work, being afflicted with sunstroke in the hayfield, she has him brought to the house, nurses him through a serious illness, and—the tramp turning out to be a rather good-looking young Hercules of culture and education, though, of course, in reduced circumstances—the usual result happens, in accordance with the custom of every properly ordered novel. The peculiarity of the present case, however, is that the sunstroke has deprived our hero of all recollection of his name or past life, though he retains every other kind of knowledge in full vigour. From a physiological point of view this is perhaps a possible and legitimate situation, and the subsequent details are fairly well worked out. What is likely most to affect the popularity of the book is the general nature of its subject. A very clever touch is required to invest humble scenes and humble surroundings with any absorbing amount of interest. Christian—that is the name bestowed upon him by his nurse, and adopted by the Purley family, after his recovery—resumes work as a farm servant, and continues it through a great part of the story. It is to be feared that readers, as a rule, care too little about Hodge, his stuffy cottage, his dirty clothes, and his drunken habits, to make the task of describing him a very profitable one. Miss Hart’s descriptions are faithful enough, and her style is pleasing; but she scarcely possesses the high order of genius requisite to ennoble the subject she has chosen.

The new story by Amélie Rives is of a distinctly modern-American type, and of a type which, it must be confessed, the present reviewer heartily dislikes. It would seem as if the commercial success achieved by two transatlantic books of a widely different kind—namely, The Gates Ajar and Helen’s Babies—had suggested to other novelists the idea of bidding for popular favour by a species of story which should unite the leading features of both these works; otherwise it is difficult to account for the number of American novels one comes across, abounding on the one hand with the prattling of precocious children, and on the other with the morbid self-torture of sufferers who are eating their hearts out over real or imaginary sorrows. The former exasperates by its ridiculous unreality, the other serves no purpose except to depress one by its sepulchral gloominess. In According to St. John the element of sepulchral gloom predominates. The scene is laid among a colony of Americans in Paris. An artist named Farrance loses his wife whom he has passionately loved, and marries another whom he tries to love passionately but cannot. The wife, perceiving that her affection is not adequately returned, fortifies herself with the scriptural text, “Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends,” and brings the melancholy tale to a conclusion by means of a fatal dose of morphine. It is only fair to add that the style of the book is by no means deficient in power, and readers who rejoice in the harrowing and the tragic will probably find abundance to their taste in it.

From the internal evidence afforded by the pages of Mrs. Arnold we should conjecture the author to be a young lady of wide reading and lively imagination, with exceedingly ill-developed powers of observation. The leading idea of the book is the one now so much in fashion among lady novelists, namely the reformation and enlightenment of some erring male at the hands of the superior person who has condescended to become his wife. There is no doubt that Miss Christabel Ward, who marries Hubert Arnold, is a superior person. Unfortunately, nearly everyone in the book is a superior person also. There is scarcely a character who is not ready upon occasion to fire off an appropriate quotation from Browning, or Bulwer, or Comte, or Victor Hugo, or any other latter-day poet or pros-writer, and to talk in the style of a dilettante philosopher. This imparts an air of monotony and unreality to a book which otherwise might claim more than ordinarily high rank. The fact is that the writer has not sufficiently dissociated herself from her characters: their talk is more the reflex of her own views and ideas than any outcome of their own individuality. Of the details of the story we need hardly speak; there is little or no plot; the motif is of unexceptionable merit, and the writing throughout shows evidence of cultured thought and scholarship.

In Eleven Possible Cases we have a collection of stories varying considerably in interest, but forming, on the whole, a very readable volume. “The Only Girl at Overlook,” by Franklin Fyles; “The Mystic Krewe,” by Maurice Thompson; and a delightfully comic and all too short anecdote by “Q,” entitled “The Cheated Juliet,” are perhaps the gems of the collection.

It can hardly be said that A Schoolmaster’s Chat, by Orbilius, is a worthy representative of the series of novelettes associated with its publisher’s name. It is only a record of a few practical jokes and casual adventures, including a mild love affair or two, the whole being an assistant master’s experiences during a short engagement at a country grammar school.

GIFT BOOKS.

Celtic Fairy Tales. Selected and edited by Joseph Jacobs; illustrated by John D. Batten (David Nutt.) Thales, according to Aristotle, showed that a philosopher can make money if he chooses. Last year we had experience of the most laborious of our school of folk-lore students could turn aside from his task of tracking Aesop to his oriental source, in order to recast some of our most familiar nursery stories for the benefit of the book-reading generation of young folk. For a companion volume to English Fairy Tales he has now had recourse to that treasury of Celtic legend which is being gradually revealed to us by the united labour of many scholars. The present writer, perhaps from some racial defect, feels himself unable to appreciate so highly as others the spirit of weirdness that dominates the creations of Gaelic romance. The grim East Anglian humour of the recently recovered "Tom Tit Tot" is to him worth all the tedious adventures of Finn and Cuchulain; and the more so because the former cannot be connected with any doubtful doctrines of history or philology. Just as he reads a novel for its intrinsic interest—which is not the same thing as reading only for the plot—so he prefers fairy tales that do not compel him to think about their possible congeners. He finds the Celtic imagination too lively for his dull sense, and withal somewhat confusing. But to prate like this is a poor return for the pains Mr. Jacobs has expended in introducing to English children a few of the stories which to this day compose the oral literature of Irish, Highlanders, and Welsh. The Cornish tale here given, though said to be translated from that extinct language, has nothing distinctively Cornish about it. The narrator has failed only in his prosaic version of "Beth Gellert," doubtless introduced as a foil to his erudite note which destroys once and for all the localisation of the widespread myth. Mr. Batten's illustrations are admirable for cleverness and grace; but he, too, is more at home with Hodge than with Paddy, with the netherworld of demonology than with the intermediate realm of Celtic fancy.

The Dash for Khartoum. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie.) Mr. Henty, although he tries here a new field, exhibits no falling off in story-telling power. It is impossible, of course, and more's the pity—to make any genuine addition to such narrative as exists, and may reasonably be believed to be authentic, of the siege of Khartoum and Wolsley's Relief Expedition; and Mr. Henty does not attempt anything of the kind. But he adds a genuine plot-interest—the interest of a novel with a well-constructed plot—to the accepted historical narrative, by introducing the designs of the adventurer, Mrs. Humphreys, into the life of the Clinton household, and sending the hot-headed boy, Edgar, into Africa, where he encounters all sorts of dangers, and meets in succession the man Humphreys who is supposed to be his father, and Rupert Clinton whom he now believes to be no relative of his. It is literally true that the narrative never flags a moment; for the incidents which fall to be recorded after the dash for Khartoum has been made and failed, are quite as interesting as those which precede it. The characters of all the persons, and in particular of the Clintons and their boy friends, are remarkably life-like.

How Martin Drake found his Father. By G. Norway. (Sampson Low.) Mr. Norway has now secured a place—and a very high place—among writers for boys. He has a little more of Mr. Rider Haggard's imagination, for example, than either Dr. Gordon Stables or Mr. G. A. Henty. In this story of "white and black slavery in the early days of the American colonies," with its smugglers and Indians, and what not, he is certainly seen at his best. The plot of some of his stories seems to drag sadly; here he is all grip and go, from the first chapter, the scene of which is laid in Devonshire, to the last, in which Simon Drake and his family are seen to be reconciled to their position as "Wanderers in the West." As may be imagined from the title, Martin Drake is much more the hero of the story than the father, whom he discovers and rescues; but the little lad Willie is by no means an uninteresting or unpicturesque figure, especially when he falls into the hands of the slave-dealer.

The Honourable Miss. By L. T. Meade. (Methuen.) As a writer especially for girls, Mrs. Meade holds a place midway between Mr. Norris and the lady who is best known by her maiden name of Annie Swan. Her characters are gloved and costumed by Mr. Norris, but their feelings are pervaded by the sweet—in some cases "sacred"—simplicity of Miss Swan. The Honourable Miss is, in reality, a delightful and protracted duel between Beatrice Meadowsweet and Josephine Hart, aided by their respective partisans, for the possession of the eligible Loftus Bertram. The apparent victory remains with Josephine; but everybody will accept the verdict of the ladies at the end of the book, that Beatrice has the face and heart of an angel. The characters in The Honourable Miss belong mainly to that clericalised society in which Mrs. Meade is evidently most at home. This is a well-constructed, well-written, interesting, and, above all things, dainty story.

The Church and the King. A Tale of England in the Days of Henry VIII. By Evelyn Everett-Green (Nelson), and Dorothy Dymoke, A Story of the Pilgrimages of Grace. By Edward Gilliat (S.P.C.K.), are two stories relating to the period when the excitement caused by Thomas Cromwell's high-handed measures against the monasteries was at its height. Both writers show a good knowledge of the history, and neither can be accused of fanatical partisanship; but Miss Everett-Green's story is written from the point of view of the moderate reformers, while Mr. Gilliat's sympathies are decidedly with the beaten cause. Miss Everett-Green writes very pleasantly, though her personages are too much given to long monologues in their conversation. Her story is well constructed, and her characters lifelike, though the tone of sentiment with regard to theological and other matters is rather anachronistic. Mr. Gilliat's book is not equal to his former essay in historical fiction, Forest Outlaws; but it has considerable merit, the best scenes being those in which actual historical characters are concerned. The leader of the "Pilgrimage of Grace," Robert Aske, a rebel of whom even Mr. Froude speaks with compassionate respect, is among the personages introduced.

Roger Ingleton, Minor. By Talbot Baines Reed. (Sampson Low.) This is an excellent story. We cannot say that the plot is either very probable or very novel, and sometimes the style betrays a certain want of literary culture; but the characters, especially those of the young folks, are cleverly drawn, the dialogue is natural, and the interest is kept up to the last page.

Rudolph of Rosenfeldt. A Story of the Times of William the Silent. By John W. Spear. (Hodder & Stoughton.) This story opens with the famous Conference which met near Brussels just before the Duke of Alva "had launched his Spanish hordes" on the Netherlands. At this meeting William the Silent, Prince of Orange, and the counts Egmont and Horn, of famous memory, were present. Rudolph of Rosenfeldt, a friend of the Prince's, and the hero of this book, becomes a disciple of Luther, and so imperils his marriage with "the fair Christina;" but she too renounces the faith of Rome, and everything ends happily. The love-plot, intermingled with the history of an exciting period, renders the book attractive.

The King's Cup-Bearer. By Mrs. O. F. Walton. (Religious Tract Society.) We have nothing but praise for the almost scholarly care of Mrs. Walton's interesting account of the life of Nehemiah. The story is told as simply as possible, and is doubtless intended to interest young people in a period of Jewish history which is usually neglected. It is accompanied by one or two maps and plans, which are rendered almost unnecessary by the careful clearness of the narrative. All students of the Old Testament will find the book of use. We have only one objection to make to the author's treatment. She has to tell the story of the quarrels between the Jews and Samaritans, and the strong measures taken by Nehemiah to prevent any mingling of the two peoples. Her view of the inspiration of her authorities compels her to justify all that Nehemiah did, and to approve the fierce desire of the Jewish people to call down fire upon all the Samaritan land. She actually permits herself to quote St. Luke ix. 53, as if it were the only passage in the New Testament bearing on the question of the relations between Jews and Samaritans; and she seems quite unconscious of the narrow selfishness which, to readers of the New Testament, must be painfully obvious in Nehemiah's policy.

The Pilots of Pomona. By R. Leighton. (Blackie.) This is a capital story for boys. The scene is laid in Stromness in the Orkney Isles, and the strong local colouring adds much to the interest of the tale. Halero Ericson, the hero, tells the story of his own life, which has had a fair share of dangers and adventures. Early in the book he finds a black stone (said to be an amulet) among some buried treasure in a Viking's grave. This stone plays an important part in the story, and is found finally to be no talisman, but to contain a valuable diamond. There are adventures in a smugglers' cave, and the discovery of a frozen ship in the Arctic Seas; and if Mr. Leighton does not treat these as sensationally as some writers of fiction for boys, perhaps the book is healthier on that account. The illustrations and map of the Orkney Isles deserve praise, and the binding is good and attractive.

Where Two Ways Meet. By Sarah Doudney. (Hutchinson.) This is a little story of village life, about a London child who is deserted by her vagrant father and stepmother, and is adopted by cottage folk who have a daughter of the same age. The opening chapter is somewhat striking in its pathetic power; the book as a whole does not quite fulfil the anticipation raised by the merit of the early pages, but it is interesting and gracefully written.

Barerock; or, The Island of Pearls. By Henry Nash. (Edward Arnold.) This is a rather extravagant story of adventure, in which it is easy to trace the influence of Mr. Rider Haggard. It is not badly written, and is entertaining, though some of the incidents are too improbable to be taken seriously. The illustrations, by Mr. Lancelot Speed, are very unequal, but one or two are clever.

Captain Japp; or the Strange Adventures of Willie Gordon. By Gordon Stables, M.D. With Illustrations by W. J. Overend. (S.P.C.K.) This is an exciting book for boys, with its tales of sharks, bears, blizzards, blood, &c. There are some interesting chapters about Japan, Yokohama, Tokiyo, and the wonderful land of the Ainos. The illustrations are good.

Marian; or, The Abbey Grange. By A. E. Armstrong. (Blackie.) This is distinctively a book for girls. It contains a bright, wholesome story, with the useful morals of industry and forgiveness of injuries. Every here and there Miss Armstrong slips into solecisms, "without you asked me to do so" and the like; but as a whole the book is decidedly to be commended.

An Old Maid's Child, by F. C. Playne (S.P.C.K.), is a pretty and rather humorous child's story of the adventures of Cris Lane and Kitty Kingston—the former being an old maid's child. The story is pleasingly told, and reveals considerable insight, not only into children's talk, but into their nature and modes of thought. We confess to feeling such an interest in the story as to have found it too short, though it is not often that a child's book—or, for that matter, any other—errs in this direction.

Climbing the Hill, and Other Stories. By Annie S. Swan. (Blackie.) The first and best of the three stories included in this volume are not Scotch, like most works from the same pen. But the kind of human nature in which the writer, who still styles herself Annie Swan, mines as for the hidden treasure of character is much the same on the south as on the north side of the border. At all events, her picture of an energetic and good lad, who struggles and triumphs over unmerited opprobrium and other misfortunes, is none the worse that she plants him down in "one of the dingiest and smokiest of English manufacturing towns." The portraits of Willie Trevor and his mother, and the boy who lives in a lower grade of society than even Willie, are all exceptionally good; and the story is itself a most stimulating one. "A Year at Coverley" and "Holidays at Sunnycroft" are almost too elaborate attempts to reproduce boyhood and girlhood at different stages; but they are, nevertheless, wholesome and thoroughly readable in their way. If this volume does not add to its author's reputation, it will not take from it.

Peck. By the Rev. W. Bettison. (S.P.C.K.) This is a prettily-written story of a London street arab. We suppose the demand for this sort of story is large, for the supply seems unfailing. The story of "Peck" resembles many others of its class. A rich London banker gives a half-sovereign instead of the promised sixpence to a little boy who carries his bag for him (it seems to be a peculiarity of London bankers to mistake half-sovereigns for sixpences in stories of this kind); and "Peck" being an honest boy returns the half-sovereign, and is thereupon taken into the employ of the banker's family. We leave him at the end of the book happy and respectable.

Work, Wait, Win. By Ruth Lamb. (Nisbet.) The young man who "works, waits," and ultimately "wins," is John Simpson, who, after being ruined by a reckless father's speculations, contrives, by industry and thrift, to regain the position his unworthy parent had forfeited. The book is, as usual with books of the same class, a panegyric of respectable and honest poverty, and so far carries an indisputably true as well as a valuable moral, though why it should be considered needful to reward a male devotee of poverty with a fortune of £30,000, and with a wife possessed of an equal amount, we confess we cannot see. If poverty is so intrinsically estimable, why not let her shift for herself, or if she must be dowered—to the loss of her genuine character—might not a less figure than £60,000 suffice? Miss Flint, a capricious old maid, though not exactly a novel character, is well drawn.

EVELYN E. GREEN'S new book, A Holiday in a Manor House (Biggs), is brightly written, and the interest is maintained to the last page. It shows that what is often ascribed by the ignorant to supernatural agency may possess a perfectly natural solution. It is high time to protest against children calling their father and mother by the affected names "pater" and "mater."

By the North Sea Shore (S.P.C.K.) contains a pleasant idyll of fisher folk in a Scotch village. The name of the author, Rothael Kirk, is new to us, but he may be encouraged to persevere in literature. The Scotch dialect is true to life, and the scenery of the East Coast faithfully depicted. There is plenty of emotion in the story, and the chapter which describes herring fishing is excellent.

The Savage Queen. By Hume Nisbet. (White.) We should be glad to know for what class of readers Mr. Nisbet writes. His little book belies its outward appearance and is distinctly not for boys and girls, while we hardly think it is likely to interest readers of an older growth. True, there is a certain amount of "go" in Mr. Nisbet's style which is attractive to youth, and he can draw convicts, cut-throats, and other ruffians with considerable skill; but these are not the qualifications most essential for authorship of the better sort. The early annals of Van Diemen's Land—which supply his facts—resemble too closely the Newgate Calendar to provide suitable materials for the entertainment of the youth of either sex.

The Lonely Pyramid. By J. H. Yoxall. (Blackie.) Mr. Rider Haggard is responsible for the Lonely Pyramid. It is a lost oasis somewhere "in the desert." It has all sorts of mysterious chambers and mechanisms inside it. The villain of the story, for some sanguinary purpose, gets upon an altar which stands in the pyramid in front of a mysterious veiled figure of Isis; his weight puts in motion some secret mechanism, which causes the bronze statue to pick him up and scrunch him. The tale is enlivened by a comic negro, and introduces the Mahdi. It is a very long way behind Mr. Haggard; but it is ingenious, and will not be found incredible or uninteresting by the average schoolboy.

The Cruise of the Crystal Boat. By Gordon Stables. (Hutchinson.) It is difficult to criticise seriously the wild incoherence of this romance. Byron and Jules Verne are so oddly mixed together that the story in places reads like an elaborate joke. The hero is an Eastern prince, but the locality of his kingdom is left doubtful. The prince finds a magician, who constructs a crystal boat, for the purpose, apparently, of enabling the author to describe the polar regions, Russia, and Siberia. In order to bring the story quite down to date, Dr. Stanley's dwarfs are encountered, after which we get the battle of the Alma. Although enthusiastically romantic, the author is severely moral, and the good intentions of his efforts are obvious and praiseworthy. Unfortunately his lack of any real faculty of invention makes the book a conspicuous failure.

For Larkie's Sake. By Eleanor Sharpin. (John Hadden.) We cannot praise this well-meaning but irritating story. It is spoilt by melodramatic sentiment, and by dreary pages of fine writing about death and life and love. It has no originality of plot or incident, and might be indefinitely compressed. Perhaps if the author were humble enough to try to tell a story clearly rather than poetically, she might do better. It is when she is most ambitious that she is most common-place.

The Iron Chain and the Golden. By A. L. O. E. (Nelson.) The authoress has here set herself a difficult task, and we cannot compliment her on her success. The scene of the story is laid in England in the early part of the twelfth century; and the hero of it is one Alphege, a Saxon priest, who has married against the laws of the Church, and refuses to give up his wife at the command of Archbishop Anselm. For this and other heretical offences he is sentenced to be flogged and imprisoned for life in Basilton Abbey, from which place he escapes in disguise, and goes with his wife and child to France, where we leave them in peace and security. The story is of a controversial kind, and there are pages filled with arguments against the doctrines of the Church of Rome; while except in a few minor cases, no authorities are given for the many serious accusations against the Church of that period. And Alphege himself is altogether an anachronism: his views are as "advanced" as any disciple of Luther, and the numerous quotations he makes from the Bible are all given in the language of our Authorized Version. This and the whole tone of the conversations take from the book any claim to be a faithful picture of those times. Apart from these faults, the story has distinct merits, and will probably interest a certain section of readers.

Molly. By A. C. Hertford. (Oliphaert Anderson & Ferrier.) The title-page of the book tells us that this is at least the third story Mrs. Hertford has written; but we are bound to say, judging of her powers by this single product, that the art of telling a story is as she has yet to learn. The book resembles a piece of bad joinery; gaping and ill-fitted joints are everywhere discernible. The characters come and go without leaving any reasonable clue to their movements. No fault can be found with the moral and philanthropic teaching of the book, but proper sentiments do not suffice for the artistic weaving of a story.

Born in the Purple. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet.) This is a novelette of a commonplace kind. The heroine, reputed to be a baroness in her own right, turns out to have a prior claimant in a poor girl. The book is not much improved by being interspersed with sermons and ecclesiastical enthusiasms.

MRS. JESSIE M. E. SAXBY has written a pretty and useful book for a parish library in Her First Place (S.P.C.K.). It shows her amiability and a sweet temper on the part of a servant win over her mistresses. There is a fine at which the heroine behaves with commendable good sense. In the last page we see virtue rewarded: "she is now the cherished wife of a noble man."

MRS. MARSHALL'S new story, These Three (Nisbet), is a simple home narrative of three sisters. To say that it teaches lessons of duty followed by happiness is to describe the motif of all the authoress's tales. Every here and there it is somewhat slipshod in grammar.

Pleasant Work for Busy Fingers; or, Kindergarten at Home. By Maggie Browne. (Cassells.) Founded upon, although not a mere translation of, the German work of Barta and Niederley, these pleasantly written pages, with their wealth of diagrams, will be welcomed in many a nursery. The book can be read continuously to little ones, as it consists of dialogues between an aunt and some clever children; or the teacher may first learn for herself and then put in her own words how to make the paper figures, dolls, &c., of which the book treats. Having seen the delight which Miss Browne's volume has caused, and the interest its diagrams arouse, it is a pleasing duty to recommend it. From the simplest of exercises it gradually advances to more complicated work, even to "diagrams of the square." There are also out-door studies for the embryo botanist.

Successful Business Men. By A. H. Japp. (Virtue.) In order to recommend industry and perseverance, it was a happy thought to write an account of some dozen of the leading firms of the country which have won their way to prosperity by the exercise of these virtues. Here may be read the rise and progress of Manchester Library, of Bryant & May's matches, of the great travelling agency of the Cooks, and of similar mercantile successes. These recitals may be called the fairy tales of business. I mind refuses to grasp the number of billions of matches annually made by one firm, or the enormous quantities of volumes sent out to readers by another. The compiler has chosen an interesting subject, and worked it out with care. It is superfluous to speak of the value of such an incentive as these busy lives to the young. The book would form a most useful volume for school prizes and libraries.

NOTES AND NEWS.

ADMIRERS of Carlyle have often inquired whether it was not possible to obtain some accurate text of the course of Lectures on Literature which he delivered in 1838. They will therefore be glad to hear that these lectures are now about to be published by Messrs. Ellis & Elvey. The text is derived from the report taken at the time by the late T. Chisholm Anstey, some time M.P. for Youghal and afterwards of Bombay, two separate transcripts of which have been placed in the hands of the publishers.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW announce a uniform edition of all Mr. William Black's novels, twenty-five in number, to be issued at intervals of one month, beginning with the New Year. Each of them has been carefully revised; but the author regrets that he has not been able to re-shape and re-write so much as he had at one time contemplated. The volumes will be printed from new type, and bound in cloth; and the price of each is half-a-crown. The first to appear will be A Daughter of Ieth, illustrated with a photographic portrait.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will shortly publish a story of theatrical life, with a preface by Mr. Walter Besant, entitled Dorothy Wallis. This book is really an autobiography. It is the life of a girl related by herself in a series of letters written from day to day, as the events occur, to her lover, who is a young doctor in the service of a line of steamships. Her guardian and uncle robs her of her fortune, and she has to maintain herself. How she does this, with what courage and against what odds, the opening chapters relate. She resolves, however, being impelled by a genuine love for the art, to adopt the profession of actress; she obtains an engagement with a travelling company, and she narrates her experiences and her adventures.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have in the press a translation of Kant's "Kritik der Urtheilskraft," by the Rev. J. H. Bernard, fellow and lecturer of Trinity College, Dublin, and joint author with Prof. Mahaffy of Kant's Critical Philosophy for English Readers.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will issue next week the new volume of the "Adventure Series," entitled, Hard Life in the Colonies, and other Experiences by Sea and Land. The narrative is here printed for the first time, from private letters, dated twenty years ago, in the possession of the compiler, Mrs. C. Carlyon Jenkins. The emigrants who wrote these letters were Messrs. A. C. and J. C. Jenkins, and H. K. Dunbar. Their wanderings took them to China, Melbourne, Calcutta, and New Zealand. The work is illustrated with portraits and landscapes.

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a biographical study of Richard Wiseman, sergeant-at-arms to Charles II., by Sir Thomas Longmore. It will be illustrated with a portrait.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co. will publish a volume by Mr. J. H. Norman, entitled Metal Money and the Exchanges. The work professes to be a complete guide to the twenty-nine monetary systems used throughout the world, in the light of Mr. Norman's own unit of weight system, which has obtained the approval of not a few specialist authorities; and also to give a simple method of ascertaining the absolute pars of exchange in both gold and silver using countries, by calculating premium and discount always upon a single factor.

THE memoirs in Latin of the great Marquis Montrose by his friend Dr. Wishart, Bishop of Edinburgh, are being prepared for publication, with a translation and explanatory notes. The editors are Canon Murdoch, of All Saints', Edinburgh, and Mr. H. F. Morland Simpson, of Fettes College, Edinburgh. The book will be published by subscription.

To the "Children's Library" will shortly be added The Children's Mabinogion, being stories of Welsh chivalry, arranged by Miss Meta Williams, and illustrated from old engravings.

AMONG the biographical sketches of living writers, with selections from their works, to appear in the forthcoming volume of Modern Scottish Poets, is that of a Glasgow poet, Mr. John Brown, author of "The Ripple o' the Burnie."

WE understand that the Lecture Agency, Limited, has arranged for Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, the explorer of Greenland, to deliver a series of lectures in this country during February and March. He will describe in detail his theories as to the currents which he believes to exist in the Arctic Ocean, and by the aid of which he hopes to pass near the centre of the Polar regions during the expedition he proposes to start in the spring of 1893.

PART III, of the Proceedings of the Maine Historical Society contains two papers by Fellows of the University of Madras, both relating to the development of institutions, for the study of which we understand that the society was founded. Prof. J. H. Stone, in order to illustrate the methods of historical research, selects three examples and explains them with some detail: (1) The criticism by the late Fustel de Coulanges of the passages in the Germania of Tacitus dealing with the system of land-tenure; (2) the use made by Mr. J. L. Gomme of survivals—which is censured as extravagant; and (3) Mr. Seebohm's painstaking reconstruction of the English village community. In the second paper, Prof. John Adam, principal of Pachaiyappa's College, compares the power of the father in the Roman and the Hindu family. English readers will be most interested in his exposition of the development of Hindu law, according to which all the male members of the family have come to possess a sort of coparcenary right over the property of one another; while it is expected of the father that he should resign his authority, when stricken in years, and adopt the hermit's life. To how great an extent the theory of the law still affects practice may be learnt from a Bill recently introduced into the Madras legislature by a native member, which seeks to declare that the gains of learning made by a member of a joint family shall be his separate property, notwithstanding any custom or interpretation of Hindu law to the contrary.

WE have received two discourses by Senor Don G. de Azarate, the distinguished Spanish economical writer: the first, his reception discourse at the Real Academia de Ciencias Morales y Politicas, on May 7, upon "The Science of Sociology"; the other, delivered as the opening lecture of the present session of the Ateneo of Madrid in November, is more general—on the social question in relation to tenures of property and forms of government.

DURING the past few days the deaths have been announced of Prof. Kuenen, of Leiden (concerning whose contributions to the criticism of the Bible we hope to say something next week); of Mr. W. G. Wills, playwright, novelist, and painter; and of Mrs. Charles Kingsley, the biographer of her famous husband, whom she survived by nearly seventeen years.

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE will contribute to the new volume of the North American Review a series of articles on "The Olympian Religion."

THE volume of Good Words, beginning with January, will have two new novels: "The Magic Ink," by Mr. William Black; and "The One Good Guest," by Mrs. L. B. Walford. There will also be a series of papers on "The Moon," by Sir Robert Ball; and on African travel, by Mr. Joseph Thomson, including a description of his recent visit to the spot where Livingstone died.

THE January number of Mind, the first of the new series, will contain articles by Mr. W. E. Johnson on "Symbolic Logic," by Mr. Alexander on "The Idea of Value," by Mr. McTaggart on "The Change of Method in Hegel's Dialectic," and by Prof. Lloyd Morgan on "The Law of Psychogenesis."

AN article on the crayon portrait-painter, John Russell, by Mr. George Williamson, will appear in the Magazine of Art for January, which will also contain a poem by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, with a two-page illustration by Mr. Hatherell. The "Illustrated Note-Book" will contain illustrations of the last three pictures acquired by the National Gallery, and of the "Caesar Borgia" recently purchased by Baron Rothschild for £24,000.

THE Reliquary, which was founded in 1860, by the late Llewellyn Jewitt, is about to undergo a change. It will in future be issued quarterly, at one shilling and sixpence, under the editorship of Mr. T. M. Fallow. More frequent publication is contemplated, if sufficient encouragement be given by archaeologists to the newer and cheaper form.

IN addition to the series of articles upon the Pamir region, which we mentioned last week, the forthcoming number of the Asiatic Quarterly will also print a further instalment of the papers read before the recent Oriental Congress: among others, Mr. F. Fawcett's detailed description of the prehistoric drawings on rocks near Bellary, in Southern India; facsimiles of the Batak MS. from Sumatra, giving illustrations of the germs which are thought to cause disease; "The Government, Customs, and Language of Fiji," by Mr. A. C. Fuller, Commissioner of that dependency; "The Humour of the Bible," by Dr. Chotzner; and "The Cause of Jewish Longevity in the Health-Laws of the Bible," by Mr. M. Adler.

THE sixth volume of the Newbery House Magazine commences with the January number. Among the contents will be some hitherto unpublished fragments of Coleridge and Lamb; an article on Sydney Smith, by Mrs. L. B. Walford; a scheme for clergy pensions, based on an American institution; and "The Universities and Elementary Education," by the Rev. J. H. Millard, vice-principal of St. Bede's. It has been decided to discontinue "Newberiana."

YET another new monthly is announced to appear with the New Year—the New Era, described as a review of social work and movements in the churches. The editor is Mr. W. H. Dawson, and it will be abundantly illustrated. Among the articles promised for the first number are:—"Labour and Culture," by Mr. James Bryce; "The Church and Social Questions," by the Rev. C. W. Stubbs; "Social Problems," by Prof. Stuckenberg, of Berlin; a character-sketch of Bishop Westcott, with portrait; and an illustrated account of Toynbee Hall.

THE new volume of Little Folks Magazine will contain serial stories by Mrs. Molesworth and Mr. Henry Firth. With the January number will be presented a birthday album for children, illustrated by the late Alice Havers.

THE January number of Faithful Words will contain an article, by Mr. H. F. Witherby, on "The First Parsi Convert to Christianity."

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Rev. Dr. A. M. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, has been chosen Gifford Lecturer at Aberdeen University, in succession to Dr. E. B. Tylor.

MR. RICHARD CONGREVE has been elected an honorary fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, of which he was the leading tutor some forty years ago.

CONVOCAION at Oxford has presented the Rev. Dr. Richard Morris to the vicarage of Arundel, Sussex, which had fallen to the University by reason of the patron being a Roman Catholic. Dr. Morris received from Oxford, as long ago as 1874, the honorary degree of M.A., in consideration of his contributions to English philology.

THE Ashmolean Museum at Oxford has recently acquired a little cylinder, engraved with a short cuneiform inscription and four Hittite symbols. Now that the famous boss of Tarchondemos has disappeared, this is the only "bilingual" Hittite text known; and Prof. Sayce claims that it confirms his interpretation of the other. It was acquired from an Armenian dealer at Constantinople, through the good offices of Canon Greenwell.

ON the recommendation of the special board of classics at Cambridge, a grant of £100 has been made from the Worts Travelling Scholars Fund to Mr. E. F. Benson, of King's College, towards defraying the expenses of his archaeological researches in Greece.

ON Thursday of last week, the undergraduates of Christ Church presented to Dean Liddell a parting gift, consisting of two richly embossed silver lamps, together with the following address:

"Viro admodum reverendo Henrico Georgio Liddell, S.T.P., Aedis Christi Decano, ejusdem Aedis Scholares atque Commensales, S.P.D. Rebus Aedis nostrae, vir praeclarissime, qua gravitate, quo judicio, quam insigni industria tot annos praeferueris haud immemores ab officio tam constanter gesto discedentem te desiderio atque reverentia unanimi prosequimur. (Quare pietatis nostrae deperat unquam recordatio gratiarum hodie monumentum quantulumcumque tibi deferimus: Deum simul precati ut fausta omnia et felicia, inter caritatis officia, inter laetitiam tuorum, abunde tibi largiatur."

DURING the past term at Oxford, a son of the Dean of Christ Church has been elected to a fellowship at All Souls, and a son of the Archdeacon of Oxford to a fellowship at Balliol; while a son of the Chancellor of the University has been nominated to a fellowship at Hertford. We may also mention that the new president of the Union is a son of the late Archbishop Magee, and the new secretary a son of Sir Walter Phillimore, while the treasurer is the nephew of one who was himself treasurer twenty years ago.

MISS PHILIPPA FAWCETT has been elected to the Marion Kennedy studentship, and Miss Elliot and Miss Field to Bathurst studentships, at Newnham College, Cambridge. These studentships are held by women who have finished their university course, and who are continuing their residence for the purpose of carrying on advanced work.

THE council of Cavendish College, Cambridge, has decided to close the college at the end of this year, the students now in residence having been transferred to other colleges in the university. Arrangements are being made for graduates who wish to proceed to higher degrees or to continue on the university register, and the college registers will be placed in the custody of the Non-Collegiate Students' board. It is hoped that the buildings will continue to be utilised for some educational institution.

THE chair of botany at Owens College, Manchester, has become vacant by the resignation of Prof. W. C. Williamson, who has worthily filled it for many years.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

RONDEL.

SHE who is mine, whose soul is all my own
As mine is hers, long loved and early known,
With what warm hands, with what a loving face,
She gives me welcome to this quiet place,
This cottage hearth, where we two dwell alone!
We have the poor for neighbours; we are one,
Content with simple duties simply done;
And she, at least, of no ambitious race—
She who is mine.

Ah yes! Life's vain results have come and gone;
And the dry heart, like a cold kernelstone
Within its wither'd pulp and shrunken case,
Might well have lost such fulness and such grace
As once it had, but for this love, full grown
And resolute and pure, that she hath shown—
She who is mine.

THE CHARTER FOR A LONDON
TEACHING UNIVERSITY.

THE promoters of this charter have only themselves to blame for the ridiculous position into which they have brought the question of academic education in London. We have, during the whole discussion of the last few years, maintained the position that what is really needed in London is a university on the lines of Berlin or Leipzig. The professorships ought to be the best in England, and the chief posts, at any rate, might remain in the gift of the Crown; the laboratories and libraries ought to be the best equipped in the kingdom, and the university ought to draw students and investigators not only from the five millions of London, but from the greater Britain over the seas. Such a university would not only be able to retain in London men like Burdon Sanderson, Seeley, Gardiner, Sylvester, and Lankester, but it would bring others there. We should not have the spectacle of Glasgow offering greater attractions than the metropolis, or of Oxford stealing our best teachers when they have won an external reputation. We should not have a city, richer, perhaps, than any other in historical records, without an historical seminary, an historical school, or even a teacher who has done first class historical work. We should not have one of the chief oriental powers of the world with an oriental school in its metropolis, the professors of which are unpaid, and the students of which are only conspicuous by their absence. A really great scheme would have brought the support of external scholars, and have raised some enthusiasm among those who have the interests of learning, and not self-advertisement, at heart. Into such a scheme, existing institutions might have been thrown as into a melting-pot; but their councils and teachers would have had no claim to a controlling voice in its management, and only an equitable right that the new arrangement should not interfere suddenly and arbitrarily with the livelihood of the existing staff. If it be said that such a scheme is impossible, that it would require the alteration of acts and charters, the reply is that parliament has often reconstituted far more complex relations, and that the proposed charter is from the parliamentary standpoint more impossible than any such scheme would probably be.

The Albert University terms itself a teaching university, and therefore presumably will have teachers. Who then are these teachers? So far as the faculties of arts and science are concerned, they are the teachers of University and King's Colleges, with possibly "power to add to their number." Now there is at King's College a most strong religious test—a test which, if it were published in the form in which it was put only six or seven years back, for aught we can say to the contrary is still put to-day—ought to be the death-blow to the Albert charter. A university which does not appoint its own teachers, but whose teachers are appointed for it by the councils of the colleges and under such restrictions as the charters of these colleges may impose, ought, and we believe will, find itself from the parliamentary standpoint an utter impossibility. No member, however Tory his predilections will in the face of the modern electorate have a word to say in favour of a university, of which one half the members in the faculties of arts and science are appointed under a stringent religious test. Such a university, however unsectarian one of its constituents may or may not be, can only be described as sectarian.

But the Albert University, should it come into existence, will not only be sectarian, it will be pettifogging. It will start with no funds, no laboratories, nothing but examinations. It will be said that its funds and laboratories are those of the colleges, the sufficient reply is that over these funds and laboratories, as over the teachers, it will have absolutely no control. It will not regulate the one or appoint the other. In a university controlled by these colleges, we are not likely to see extra-collegiate professors of the highest status appointed, or funds devoted to their support. There is nothing in the proposed charter which will tend to keep the best men in London, still less to bring them there. It elevates the teachers of those colleges, teachers of those colleges and not as independent scholars and men of science, to a position which they can lay no claim. Many of them would do the highest honour even to a metropolitan university; but for this university their individual capacity, not their college appointments, ought to qualify them. In the Albert University is not placed above the teachers of the two colleges, but the teachers of these colleges will largely control the university; the door is thus opened to any society or institution, which employs the very same teachers or teachers of like calibre, to claim for itself an administrative voice in the new university. If a portion of the work of the college is either in day or evening classes, is of the same character as that undertaken by the Birkbeck or Polytechnic Institutions by aid, possibly, of the same teachers, why should not these institutions also have a voice in the control of the university? If the promoters of the Albert charter had modelled a university on German lines, the reply would be easy to give; but the Albert charter can give no reply to the question, because its principal clauses are devoted to the reconstitution of academic teaching in London, to the elevation of the teaching far above the level of civil service classes and Burlington House B.A. degrees, to the methods in which teachers, themselves independent of the university, can still be endowed with the power of granting degrees.

The pettifogging character of the proposed university has brought a rapid nemesis on the promoters in the form of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching. We ought to say, in the person of its energetic secretary. Not a stone has been returned by the Extensionists to demonstrate that the proposed university is utterly untenable unless university extension lecturers and the University Extension Society be admitted to a college to the proposed university. Changes have been made for the London University Extension which are utterly unwarranted, either the character of its work, or by the type of its students. We admit fully the usefulness of university extension lectures: they culated thought and study in many minds; it to assert that their teaching is academic, that they lead to research in themselves (one journal has recently done), only shows us hopelessly ignorant the world of political newspaper editors are either of what learning and research mean, or of what university extension lectures really accomplish. Those who have had experience not only of extension teaching, but of real university work, are those whom we must appeal on this point; and our judgment, so far as our investigations go, is unanimous. Extension lectures are a valuable form of popular education, but no more in themselves academic training than reading a popular science series is a scientific education. It, as we have seen, the promoters of the Albert charter have brought this journalistic form on themselves. Instead of promoting the highest academic organisation, they were led by a shabby ideal of a university, and now they are threatened with the lowest results. There was nothing in their scheme to raise anyone's enthusiasm, and they have been left practically without a supporter in the press. Their scheme as remodelled by the committee of the London Extension Society, becomes a gigantic night-school with peripatetic teachers and the inevitable magic lantern. This may be a popular idea of a university in the minds of official members of parliament; but for anyone who values higher education, it is pitiable. We have not a word to say against the university extension lecturers, many of them are trained teachers and original workers, lecturing, however, under great disadvantages to popular sciences. As one recently said: "My lectures are not only an outrage to science." But it is not the bulk of these lecturers who claim incorporation in any teaching university for London. It is the restless activity of certain "Extension" enthusiasts who, in their strong belief in its future, have lost all sense of its true limits and all real appreciation of academic education. University extension connotes a university to extend itself, employ its spare powers in popular teaching; that the University Extension Society has a right to any control of university organisation in London would be absurd, were it not so plausible a democratic cry. The democracy has yet to learn that to educate itself by extension lectures or otherwise, it must first educate its lecturers; and this cannot be done by extension societies, Birkbeck institutions, or pettifogging universities.

Were the Albert charter to be dropped, probably no one would mourn but its promoters; when it was dropped on the ridiculous pretext that it did not include the London Society for University Extension, we should not complain. London had better wait another ten or twenty years for a great university than be endowed with a pettifogging degree-giving corporation, which cannot attract the first teaching power in the country to its side. The real danger lies in the possibility that the promoters of the charter may seek power to modify it in the direction of the recent press outcry. The Albert charter is bad enough; but the Albert charter plus the London Society for the Extension of University Education means the perpetuation for long years of academic confusion and of low standards of learning in the teaching work of the metropolis. By all means, let the scheme be withdrawn; do not let it be withdrawn on the grounds that the proposed university would be sectarian and would be totally unworthy of the greatest city in the world, not on the ground that it does not embrace a private society, doing no doubt excellent popular work, but not work of an academic character. To withdraw it on this ground is indeed "an outrage on science" and learning, which could only occur in a land where educational ideals are ill understood and where the press and platform ever open to the noisy champions of chimeras. KARL PEARSON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTES ON HERO[N]DAS.

Trinity College, Dublin: Dec. 12, 1891.

II. 25: οὐχ ἐστὶ ἤμιν ἡ ἀλευρῆ τῆς πόλιος, ἄνδρες κῆρ' δ' ἐφ' ἑμυνέρεθε τὴν αὐτονομίην ἡμέων Θαλῆς λύσει.

ἡμέων is superfluous; and, as a friend of mine has pointed out to me, is not likely to form a cretic in Herondas. Read—τὴν αὐτονομίην λυμὲ δ' ἂν Θαλῆς λύσει

"a ruffian of a Thales."

A. PALMER.

Chelton Rectory, Bridgnorth: Dec. 14, 1891.

II. 44, 45: μὴ πρὸς τε κίππος φησι χῶ ταπης ἡμῖν τοῦ του λογοῦ δι τούτο ληϊης κίρρη.

Prof. Palmer seems determined at all costs to get a reference to Μυσῶν λαιδ in this passage; but are not the expedients to which he is reduced rather desperate? It seems possible that a superlative agreeing with ληϊης lurks at the end of the first line. I would propose:

μὴ πρὸς γε κίππων ἡσυχωτάτης ἡμῖν τὸ τοῦ λόγου, κ.τ.λ.,

the sense being that the fleching some of Battarus's time for speaking would be very easy spoil for Thales compared with his former exploit.

For πρὸς with accus. = "compared with," and the ω-form of the comparative of ἡσυχος (see L. and S.)

VI. 15 ff. After Mr. Headlam's apposite reference to Plautus for the opening lines of this Mime, it seems very probable that the δούλη does not come in at all as a speaker, and one may feel pretty confident in assuming that these lines belong to Metro. Taking the additional letters which have been pretty generally assumed, they stand:

ἀλλ οὐνεκεν π(ρ)ο σ[ηλθ]ον εκποδων ημιν φθιμεσθε νω θυστρα ω[τα] μουνον και γλασσαι τα δ αλλ εορτη.

Most writers seem agreed that from εκποδων to εορτη is addressed parenthetically to the servant, reproaching her with being all ears and tongue. Is it not possible that the word concealed by νω θυστρα is νούθυστρα (see L. and S.), the sense being "Your wits are all in your ears and tongue." The ρ might have slipped in from the προσηλθον in the line above.

A word as to the additional lines so cleverly handled by Prof. Palmer and Mr. Headlam in this week's ACADEMY. Considering the character of several of the Mimes, is it not rather a work of supererogation to be at the trouble of evolving an additional line in order to avoid a word which is "very coarse"?

I. 16. χῆ σκῆ πρέστηκεν, "The shadow [of death] stands by." W.G.R.

So far as I have seen, no one has taken exception to this interpretation. But is it a Greek idea? (Of course it is familiar enough to us from Tennyson (In Mem. xxii. xxiii). πρέστηκεν is also awkward, coming immediately after προσέστηκεν. Stob. has παρεστήκει. Perhaps we should read κῆς σκῆς κῆρος τῆκει = "and wastes us to a shadow all too soon."

"COPPERAS," "COPPER-NOSE."

Oxford: Dec. 8, 1891.

The word "copperas" is well known to present some etymological difficulties, not indeed so far as concerns its immediate source in English, but with regard to its ulterior history. The various later English forms, copperras, -ass, -ase, -es, -osse, -ice, -is, are all perversions of the form copperose, which prevailed from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries, with the numerous by-forms copperosse, -ous, -ouisse, copperose, &c., &c. And copperose "vitriola," found already in the Promptorium Parvularium (circa 1440), is identical with F. copperose, of which Littré has a fourteenth century example, with sixteenth century variants, coupperose, copperoze. The word appears in Ital. as copparosa, in Sp. caparrasa; in mediæval Latin, cuperosa, cuperosa, all occurring in early Glossaries and Vocabularies to which references are given by Hildebrand in Grimm, under the words Kupferrauch and Kupferruze. But what was med. J. cuperosa? According to Diez, it was a corruption of cupri rosa "rose of copper," which he suggested to be a Latin rendering of Gr. χάλκανθον "flower of copper," meaning, according to Liddell and Scott, "a solution of blue vitriol (sulphate of copper), used for ink and shoemakers' blacking"—not very like a rose, though answering fairly to a sense in which "flower" was used by the alchemists.

Now there is no doubt that cuperosa, cuprosa, was explained in the sixteenth century, and perhaps earlier, as "rose of copper." Kilian, writing at Antwerp in 1597, has in his Dictionary "Koper-roose, koper-water, chalcantum, vitriolum, vulgo cuperosa et coppa rosa;" and Henisch (according to Hildebrand, following Kilian) has German "cupferwasser, cupferrose," explained in identical terms. Moreover, mod. Dutch has koper-rood copperas, lit. "copper-red"; and among obsolete or dialectal German forms in Grimm are Kupferrot, LG. koperröt, which are apparently to be explained only from the rose notion. But so far as I have investigated the matter, I doubt very greatly Diez's explanation, unquestioningly repeated though it has been by later compilers. There may be evidence of the existence of an original cupri rosa*, which I have not seen; but pending its production, I would suggest that the actually known mediaeval L. forms cuperosa, cuprosa, stand simply for aqua cuprosa "cuprous water," the equivalent of German kupferwasser and Kilian's koperwater, and a fitting name for the solution mentioned by Liddell and Scott, as also for the natural streams of cupreous waters well known in various localities. Then, I should suppose cuperosa was associated with rosa and explained as copper-rose by "popular" (in this case probably "pedantic") etymology, and the name to have been so rendered in some of the modern languages in the sixteenth century. When the same word (couperose) was applied in French to the pathological affection known as "copper-nose" (acne rosacea), as we find it in Paré in the middle of the sixteenth century, it must have been with reference to the etymological explanation "copper-rose," or copper-red, as is indicated also by the German "eine kupferrote nase," a copper-red nose, not from any likeness to blue or green vitriol.

I should therefore answer the question asked by Littré, "How has the medical couperose, which is red, taken its name from the mineral couperose, which is blue or green?" by saying "the mineral couperose was cuprosa, and the medical couperose was an etymological application of the pseudo-etymological cupri rosa."

Much useful help with these words is to be got from the old Glossaries and Vocabularies cited by Hildebrand in Grimm, under kupfer-rauch, -rose, -roth, -rusz, -wasser; but I find in them no evidence that cupri rosa* was anything but a figment.

I do not enter into the question how a name which, both in its Greek form χαλκαίον, and its L. cuperosa, implies an original connexion with copper, has come to be transferred, and now practically restricted to sulphate of iron. The transference or confusion is as old as Dioscorides, whose description of χαλκαίον agrees with sulphate of copper, while his account of its use agrees with sulphate of iron; and it was not complete in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when authors still distinguished "blue copperas," or "the best copperas," from green or iron copperas, and white or zinc copperas. It may, however, be worth suggesting that the original confusion arose out of the existence of natural combinations of copper and iron sulphate, of which pisanite, for example, is of a bright blue colour, and so might be identified with the copper sulphate, while the iron salt it contains would still allow of its use in making ink and "shoemakers' blacking," as mentioned by Dioscorides and Pliny.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "YET," O.E. "GIET"

Ann Arbor, Michigan.

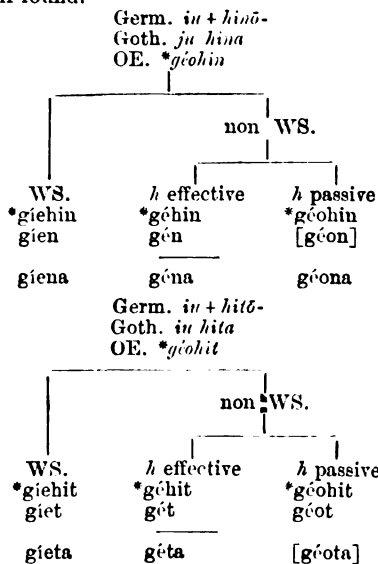

In the fall of 1889 I was hospitably entertained at Oxford by Mr. A. L. Mayhew. He told me about his forthcoming Old English Phonology, and asked me whether I knew a satisfactory explanation of O.E. ǣfre. I stated the etymology I had just published in

Mod. Lang. Notes (November, 1889), and I then explained the derivation of gien(a), giet(a), and one or two other words, which I had treated in the doctor's thesis I had just presented at Jena. Both of these derivations I find in Mr. Mayhew's book, which has just come to hand. He doubtless supposed that I had published my thesis by this time. As I have been prevented from doing so by the necessity of first spending some time at the Bodleian, I take this means of presenting more fully than Mr. Mayhew has done my explanation of the various forms of gien, giet, "still, yet, again."

I suppose the words to be composed of *iū, gīo (Goth. ju) "once, already, now, still," and the adverbial accusatives: masc. (with "day" understood), and neut., of the demonstrative hi-, which was preserved in Gothic only in forms used as temporal adverbs (d. himma daga and a. hina dag, "to-day, heretofore;" and hita, "thus far," cf. Braune, § 155).

We have various forms. The WS. ones show regular i-mutation (Sievers' § 100 b). The non-WS. forms do not (S. § 159, 4); they fall into two sets, according as the h affected or did not affect the preceding vowel (S. § 165). This depended upon whether or not the initial h retained in any community sufficient of its consonantal value when it came into the medial position through the two words being regarded and accented as one.

Aside from the prehistoric starred forms, the only ones I cannot find are gēon and gēota. The masc. forms early went out of use in WS., and so the IWS. forms with i and ǣt do not (to my knowledge) occur, but gīt, gīta, gīt, gīta, are all found.

The forms in -a may be wholly due to the analogy of other temporal adverbs in -a (E.g., singala "always," sina "soon," gēoma "once," gēotra "yesterday"), or the way may have been led by forms in -e like hine (Germ. hinōn-). I refer the forms to Germ. hinō- and hinōn- in order to distinguish them, not claiming that such forms existed, nor approving any theory as to their being due to the analogy of other forms (eg., pama, pata, &c.) similarly or otherwise derived.

GEORGE HEMPL.

Oxford.

By the courtesy of Prof. G. Hempl, I have been afforded the opportunity of seeing the above letter before publication. It is quite true that the etymologies of ǣfre and giet, which appear in my Old English Phonology, were

* I use the accents according to Sievers' interpretation of gēo, without committing myself to that theory.

+ Perhaps gien, "still, again," became confused with and absorbed by (on) gin < gian < gagn "again."

first suggested to me by Prof. Hempl, who had the pleasure of meeting him during his visit to Oxford. I think that an apology is certainly due to him from me for my not having referred to him as the originator of these extremely ingenious and, as I think, satisfactory explanations of these difficult words. As a rule, I have been most scrupulous in acknowledging obligations, as anyone can judge for himself who will turn over the pages of my "Synopsis" for a minute or two. The names of authorities for philological statements are scattered profusely over every page of the first part of the book. That Prof. Hempl's name is not referred to in these two cases is due to any conscious desire of concealing indebtedness to a well-known scholar, or of acquiring credit for myself at the expense of his ingenuity, but to an oversight which I deeply regret. The omission doubtless arose from the fact that these two etymologies were suggested to me by word of mouth, and were not, as in nearly every other case, culled from some philological treatise. I see, by the way, that Prof. Hempl's explanation of ǣfre is referred to by Mr. Bradley in the New English Dictionary (s.v. ever). Mr. Bradley says that Prof. Hempl illustrates the umlaut of ǣfre by the form ǣrende < ǣrē. There must be some mistake here. The Saxon ǣrundi and the old High German ǣrunda point to a Germanic type ǣrundi (cf. ǣrunda). Consequently the vowel ǣ of ǣrende corresponds to a Germanic ǣ and is not due to i-umlaut.

THE DATE OF NEWMAN'S ELECTION FOR TRINITY SCHOLARSHIP.

Trinity College, Oxford: Dec. 11, 1891.

As your reviewer has noticed the point, I should like to explain why I hesitated in 1818 as the date of Cardinal Newman's election to a Trinity scholarship.

It is clear from the Autobiographical Memoirs that 1818 is right; but it stands even more clearly recorded in the College Register that Newman was not admitted scholar till June 1819.

It was not till my article was past altered that I discovered the explanation of this contradiction. Newman was elected in 1818, not to a scholarship, but to the Blount exhibition, which was virtually a thirteenth scholarship in status, value, &c., but did not require the same formalities of admission. He became one of the twelve foundation scholars in 1818; and this was the ordinary course at the time.

I should have given my reason for hesitating if I had not been anxious to omit every superfluous sentence, in order to get as much as possible into the space placed at my disposal by the editor of The Colleges of Oxford.

"THE LADY OR THE SALMON."

St. Andrews: Dec. 14, 1891.

Has the ACADEMY room for the legend "The Chaplain, the Fish, and the Lost Book" referred to by Mr. Watkins as the origin of the tale, "The Lady or the Salmon"? I never had the luck to hear the anecdote about the Chaplain. Probably many other sympathetic readers of the ACADEMY are equally ignorant and equally curious.

THE WESTCAR PAPYRUS.

MITTHEILUNGEN AUS DEN ORIENTALISCHEN SAMMLUNGEN.—Heft. V., VI., Die Märchen des Papyrus Westcar. Herausgegeben von Adolf Erman. Mit 12 Lichtdrucktafeln. Berlin: Spemann.)

BEHANDLUNGEN D. KGL. GESELLSCHAFT D. WISSENSCHAFTEN ZU GÖTTINGEN.—Die Sprache des Papyrus Westcar. Von Adolf Erman. (Göttingen: Dieterich.)

THE most encouraging sign for the future of Egyptology is seen in the growth of the school under the leadership of Prof. Erman. While new collections of inscriptions, new dictionaries or handbooks, and views on points of detail spring up on every side and hasten on the advance of Egyptian philological science, there is one branch of research, vitally affecting all the others, which if one may judge from its present monopoly in the hands of a single scholar runs the greatest risk of entire neglect. The distinguished director of the Egyptian Museum, however, won his spurs as a young student in the discussion of grammatical questions; and although he has confined to archaeology the same methodical habit of observation with great success, it is his frequent articles on syntax and related subjects in the Zeitschrift für Ägyptische Sprache that the earnest worker looks to for the greatest enlightenment. Eleven years ago he published his Grammar of the Egyptian, which, appearing simultaneously with Stern's admirable Coptic Grammar, has exercised a great influence in many parts of England, though it seems to be practically unknown to those amateurs who have neither time nor inclination for details except in their own particular line of research. And here I may remark that, thanks to the constant discovery of new papyri and the comparative scarcity of workers to read them, it often falls to the lot of the beginner to make a good hit; and it is surprising how successfully Egyptology may be cultivated, and the solution of problems arrived at, without any knowledge of the principles underlying the language and writing. Some Egyptologists there are who, joining much practical and general learning to great natural ability, grasp as if by instinct the meaning of one paragraph after another even in a difficult text. This does not apply to their younger imitators who, in spite of an occasional happy thought, too often without a word of diffidence print page after page of translation which neither is in accordance with Egyptian ideas, nor can have any but the feeblest connexion with the meaning of the text they are supposed to be discussing. On the other hand, a Maspero (but there is more than one) whose writings breathe the very life of Egypt, even if he wanders here and there from the original, cannot fail to throw a flood of light on the most difficult page. A young student is now in a far better position for doing sound work than he was twenty years ago; and it is his own fault, or that of his instructor, if he does not make use of the methods suggested and the guides readily provided by the German school.

Prof. Erman's "Language of the Papyrus Westcar" is a special grammar of the best example of "Middle" Egyptian (as it may be called for the moment). This form of the language is indeed very widely separated from the Ancient Egyptian as found on the monuments of the Old Kingdom, and is much less widely separated from the New Egyptian, or popular dialect of the Rameside era, which itself is far advanced towards Coptic. I have, however, found sufficient evidence in the Kahun papyri (Flinders Petrie collection) and elsewhere to prove that it was occasionally used in writings of the XIIth Dynasty; and it can thus, with great probability, be considered to represent the popular dialect of the Middle Kingdom. Even the monumental inscriptions were tinged with it as early as the XIIth Dynasty, and they continue to be so to the end; but between the XVIIIth Dynasty and the Saite epoch there is a tendency to the New Egyptian, which is during that period found fully developed in the papyri.

The advance made since the "New Egyptian Grammar" was written has been very great, and the discovery and treatment of this further stage of the language have furnished historical explanations of many difficult points in the orthography and grammar of later times. It is not merely that the Westcar Papyrus itself is a fairly rich and unusually varied source, containing conversations as well as narrative; but besides that, it has drawn the attention of the editor to a variety of unexplained phenomena, and led him to researches which have resulted most satisfactorily. The Middle Egyptian is written in a clear orthography, free from the otiose signs and false etymologies which abound in the corrupted writing of the later period, while its syntax is more perspicuous than that of the early form. It is therefore a very valuable aid to the study of each of the others; and it is to be hoped that Prof. Erman will proceed from it to attack the great virgin citadel of the earliest stage as exemplified in the religious texts contained in the pyramids. Then we shall begin to know something of Egyptian philology; but there are undoubtedly several steps intervening, and Middle Egyptian will soon have to take a lower place.

While applauding Miss Westcar's gift to the talented and vigorous-minded Richard Lepsius, who was so soon to lead his great archaeological expedition up the Nile from Alexandria to the innermost recesses of Nubia, Englishmen may be permitted to feel a momentary pang of jealousy on reading that the Westcar papyrus was for a long time previously deposited in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; but no Egyptologist will regret that it fell to the lot of Prof. Erman to decipher and edit it. He has lavished upon its obscure pages and upon the questions to which it gave rise years of labour, the results of which have not yet ceased to appear. The special memoirs, however, have now been published; the Sprache, as I have said, contains the grammatical analysis, the two parts of the Mittheilungen contain a photographic reproduction of the manuscript, together with every aid for ascertaining the reading. These include a complete hieroglyphic transcription made from the original, and twenty-two autographed pages of remarks. The document itself is of no great length, comprising some 275 short lines, many of which are mere fragments, and this may seem a somewhat cumbersome way of introducing it to scholars; but no photographer on earth can give a clear representation of these very ancient records, which need to be studied again and again in a variety of lights, unless they are in exceptionally good condition. For my own part, I have come to the conclusion that a tracing carefully made (not however by an ignoramus) and frequently revised, will prove to be the most satisfactory method of reproducing, e.g., most of the Kahun papyri, as it certainly will be the handiest to use, though involving endless manual labour in the preparation.

For the explanation of the text Prof. Erman has transcribed it section by section into European characters, accompanying the transcription with translation and commentary. This part of the work is exceedingly instructive, and, notwithstanding the vigour with which research is prosecuted, will not soon be superseded.

The second part commences with a glossary, after which comes a most important chapter on hieratic palaeography, the first of its kind, leading at once to valuable results and promising a good return to further investigation. M. Maspero has recently thrown doubt on the Middle-Kingdom date of the famous Berlin papyri, and doubtless others have been ready to accept his attribution of them to copyists of the XVIIIth Dynasty. Prof. Erman, in spite of scanty material, proves with great ability that they are early, palaeographically distinct from those of the Hyksos period, which are again in regular sequence distinct from those written at the commencement of the XVIIIth Dynasty, while immediately afterwards, about the time of Thothmes III., a radical change to a new style took place. In the course of a few pages, order is brought out of chaos, and the Westcar Papyrus is seen to fall naturally into the Hyksos group.

I have written thus at length with the object of making known the kind of research that is now being undertaken in order to make sound the foundations of our literary knowledge of ancient Egypt. The subject of the papyrus therefore matters little for the present purpose; but as it relates strange stories of the semi-mythical kings of the IIIrd and IVth Dynasties, it is for Egyptologists a gem enshrined amid the most scholarly work that they have yet seen.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF EXPERIMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY.

THE second session of the above congress will be held in London on Tuesday, August 2, 1892, and the three following days, under the presidency of Prof. H. Sidgwick.

Arrangements have already been made by which the main branches of contemporary psychological research will be represented. In addition to the chief lines of investigation comprising the general experimental study of psychical phenomena in the normal human mind, it is intended to bring into prominence such kindred departments of research as the neurological consideration of the cerebral conditions of mental processes; the study of the lower forms of mind in the infant, in the lower races of mankind, and in animals, together with the connected laws of heredity; also the pathology of mind and criminology. Certain aspects of recent hypnotic research will also be discussed, and reports will be given in of the results of the census of hallucinations which it was decided to carry out at the first session of the congress (Paris, 1889).

Among those who have already promised to take part in the proceedings of the congress may be named the following:—Prof. Beaunis, M. A. Binet, Prof. Pierre Janet, Prof. Th. Ribot, and Prof. Richet (France); Prof. Lombroso (Italy); Dr. Goldscheider, Dr. Hugo Münsterberg, Prof. G. E. Müller, Prof. W. Preyer, and Baron von Schrenk-Notzing (Germany); Prof. Alfred Lehmann (Denmark); Prof. N. Grote and Prof. N. Lange (Russia); Dr. Donaldson, Prof. W. James, and Prof. Stanley Hall (America); and Prof. V. Horsley, Dr. Ch. Mercier, and Dr. G. J. Romanes (England). It is also hoped that Dr. A. Bain, Prof. E. Hering, and others, may be able to take part in the proceedings; and that some, as Prof. W. Wundt, who will not be able to attend the Congress, may send papers.

As a specimen of the work that will be done, it may be said that Prof. Beaunis will deal with "Psychological Questioning"; M. Binet, with "Some Aspects of the Psychology of Insects"; Dr. Donaldson, with "Laura Bridgman"; Prof. Stanley Hall, with "Recent Researches in the Psychology of the Skin"; Prof. Horsley, with "The Degree of Localisation of Movements and Correlative Sensations"; Prof. Pierre Janet, with "Loss of Volitional Power"; Prof. N. Lange, with "Some Experiments and Theories concerning the Association of Ideas"; Prof. Lombroso, with "The Sensibility of Women, Normal, Insane, and Criminal"; Dr. Münsterberg, with "Complex Feelings of Pleasure and Pain"; and Prof. Richet with "The Future of Psychology."

A committee of reception has been formed, which includes, among others, the following names:—Dr. A. Bain, Dr. D. Ferrier, Mr. F. Galton, Dr. Shadworth Hodgson, Prof. V. Horsley, Dr. Hughlings Jackson, Dr. Chas. Mercier, Prof. Croom Robertson, Dr. G. J. Romanes, Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. G. F. Stout, Dr. J. Ward, and Dr. de Watteville.

The fee for attendance at the congress is ten shillings. Arrangements will be made for the accommodation of foreign members at a moderate expense.

Communications are invited, which should be sent to one of the undersigned honorary secretaries not later than the end of June, and as much earlier than that date as possible. The communication should be accompanied by a résumé of its contents for the use of members.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Parkstone, Dorset: Dec. 11, 1891.

Dr. E. B. Tylor has called my attention to his review, in the ACADEMY of October 3, of Westermarck's History of Human Marriage, in which he objects to his name being given in my "Introductory Note" as one of the writers whose views are therein disputed. Unfortunately, I overlooked his protest at the time, and I now beg to express my regret at having unintentionally misrepresented him. I have requested the publishers to insert a slip correcting the error in all the copies they have on hand, and to omit Dr. Tylor's name in future issues.

ALFRED R. WALLACE.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MR. EDWARD CAPPS has reprinted from the Transactions of the American Philological Association an inaugural dissertation presented by him to the philosophical faculty of Yale University for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The subject is "The Stage in the Greek Theatre according to the Extant Dramas"; and, like other American scholars, the author is a strong supporter of the view, maintained upon archaeological grounds by Dr. Dorpfeld, that in classical times the stage was not raised above the orchestra. The most original part of the dissertation is a review of all the evidence to be derived from the extant Greek dramas, tragic and comic, with special reference to the interaction or commingling of actors and chorus. Mr. A. E. Haigh (The Attic Theatre, p. 153) only allows that "hardly fifteen certain examples are to be found" of this close connexion between stage and orchestra; Albert Müller (Bühnenalterthümer), giving what claims to be a complete citation of instances, makes the number of crossings of the stage by the chorus to be thirty-eight. Mr. Capps raises the total to no less than 116, which he classifies according to an original plan, and most of which he discusses in detail. He also examines those passages which are adduced in favour of an elevated stage. Altogether, his dissertation, if not easy reading, is certainly a painstaking contribution towards the settlement of a question which has led to such extraordinary differences of opinion.

THE December number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) is of exceptional interest. Mr. F. G. Kenyon here publishes for the first time the text of the detached fragments of the MS. of Herodas, referred to in his introduction to the British Museum edition. He also reprints from the ACADEMY of October 31, his list of additional and corrected readings of the papyrus, and gives an inscription which has recently been discovered near Alexandria, containing the name Herodas (sic). Mr. Robinson Ellis points out some similarities between Herodas on the one hand, and Virgil and Catullus on the other, as throwing light on the date of the former; and he further suggests that the Simon mentioned in connexion with Maron (iii. 24-26) may be none other than the Simon of the Aeneid. Prof. Lewis Campbell concludes his elaborate examination of the text of the Petrie papyrus of the Phaedo; Mr. F. W. Walker continues his Philological Notes, dealing this time with Greek aorists and perfects in -κα, his object being to show that a much closer connexion exists between the perfects in Greek and Latin than is generally allowed; Dr. C. A. M. Fennell criticises Brugmann's theory of the Indo-European nasalis sonans; Mr. James Adam explains the myth in Plato's Politicus by the light of his little book on the Nuptial Number, and, finally, there are important reviews of the Apology of Aristides, Dyer's Studies of the Gods in Greece, and Varro's Res Rusticæ.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Thursday, Nov. 26.)

DR. SANDYS, president, in the chair. Mr. Conway read (1) a note on the Homeric adjectives in -ων (ἤσπι χολκῶν, μέροπος ἀθροῦκοι, κ.τ.λ.) and kindred forms. These, he held, contained the suffix -γ-, a shorter form of -γο- (which appeared in ποδα-πό-ς, ἐπι-πῆ, belliens, &c.), just as -κ- which was already recognised as a suffix (Brugmann Grundriss ii. §

129) was a shorter form of -κο- (e.g., Gr. αἰκία, Skr. maryakus). The forms in -ων showed the most characteristic meanings of the suffix, which formed adjectives like those in English, -ish, -al, &c. (ἰσθ, ὀλκῶν = "wine-ish, wine-like" (Brugm. § 88). μέροπος "mortal" might perhaps be compared directly with Skr. (Brahmana) ἄσῶν "deadly plague." The suffix of εἰσω-ρόν, § 653 (simply meaning "being within") was that of Skr. anū-ka-, &c., showing another use of the suffix -γο- (Brugm. l. c. § 86). These forms had mostly vanished in non-Aeolic Greek, because it was only in Aeolic that ω was represented by a single sound (ω in all cases of the noun; in Ionic it would become -κ-, -τ-, or -ρ-, according to the case that followed it. φύλασις was a derivative from φύλαξ, and was originally an abstract noun (Gr. -ια (Lat. materies, &c.) and meant "border-killing": in Il. iv. 65 (during the attack on φύλασις αἰὼν = "murderous host," by the common use of abstract nouns in a collective sense. For the change of declension cf. ἀστέρης beside ἀστέρης, &c. (Brugm. Gds. ii. § 109, Remark): in this case the similarity of meaning of ἔρις μῆρις &c. helped the transition. φύλαξ* = a regular Aeolic derivative from ghū-lo-* (Att. θύω "sacrifice"), root ghū- "to kill, offer." The paper on the change of δ to λ in lacrima, in delicatus ("luxuri delicatus" Festus Ponce p. Müll. p. 68), &c., and in two or three words of modern Italian (Gröber, Grundr. Rom. Phil. p. 107) which were to be regarded merely as survivals of ancient forms. Mr. Conway held that the change must be definitely ascribed to the Sabine dialect, because the negative evidence of the place-names and place-names of all the other Italic dialects proved conclusively that the change did not take place in them; secondly, because the number of the words in Latin showed that they must have come from some closely adjacent tribe; thirdly, from direct evidence. Varro (L. l. vi. 74 and 123) quoted noresides (the form occurs where with l) and lepstae as Sabine: no other place-names contained a -d-, and, besides these examples of the change, the modern name of Horace's gelidus Digentia rivus had preserved the form of the name at the source of the stream the Sabine Hills (mons Bandusiacus), not the form by which it was known at its confluence with the Anio. Licenza was especially interesting because it vouched for the Sabine (i.e., voiceless s) pronunciation of the -g-: Digentia may have been Dienza* in Italian. (Gröber, Grundr. p. 531, § 70, Ann. J. Phil. xi. p. 302). For exact parallel cf. Latin Furibaris, Sabine Fararis, mod. Ital. Farfa. In fact, modern names which they represented the ancient at all, especially kept the local form. The word felus (Varr. L. l. 5, 97) should be corrected to felus. In conclusion, Mr. Conway endeavoured to assign special reasons for the persistence of the Sabine instead of the Latin form in different words, e.g., lacrima, from its resemblance to "wounded," delicatus as resembling delicatus, which of course came from -lacio.—Dr. Postgate read a note on Plautus Rudens, 1242, "mihi istae praeda praedatum irier," in which he contended that the editors had wrongly assigned the word a passive function, the sense and the parallelism of 1262, "praeda praedam duceret," requiring an active one. A future infinitive in irer must be added to the forms of the deponent verb. He further argued in favour of the view already forwarded by Neue (Lat. Form. u. u.), that the formations were not originally imperatives (amatam iri, "there was a going to love"), but analogical transformations of the active, irere "to be going to love."

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, Nov. 27.)

WALTER STRACHAN, Esq., president, in the chair. Mr. J. W. Mills, in a paper on "The Republic of 'The Duke of Milan,'" said that the first acts are but dreary reading, and would be yet more wearisome upon the stage. Decorum and decorum are trampled upon by the Duke's public addresses to his wife far transcending the widest limits that can be or ought to be applied to art. As the courts of Italian princes of the epoch of this play, the home and family the best and highest elements of art, refinement, and civilisation, Massinger as grossly violates the truth of things as he outrages the innate sentiment of human modesty and the true canons of dramatic art. The meeting of Sforza and Marcelia is a striking contrast to the meeting of the bello and Desdemona after a like short absence. Francisco's actions were prompted by revenge for his sister's wrongs. These two characters are the only ones that win our sympathy and interest. The sister shows all the outlines of a noble and noble nature, gentle and forgiving, and worthy a better fate. If from the last two lines of the play it is argued that it was written for a moral purpose, it is clear that crimes can be done in the name of morality as well as in the name of perversity.—Mr. Strachan read a paper entitled, "The Key-note of 'The Duke of Milan,'" which clearly to be found in the motive that prompted Francisco to act the traitor's part towards the man who had raised him, but who had wronged his sister. Massinger, perhaps the earliest moralist among the Elizabethan dramatists, touchingly pictures the mutual trust of Sforza and Marcelia, and then brings Francisco between them, parting their cloudless happiness, and teaching us that sin will bring its punishment, and that the devil's seed will bear a plentiful crop of evil.—Miss Florence Herapath read a paper on "Womenfolk in 'The Duke of Milan.'" Our number, they represent four distinct types of womanhood, and may be briefly summarised as the Lofty, the Jealous, the Spiteful, and the Frail. Marcelia is a high-souled woman, quick to rebuke, yet still more ready to pardon injuries and to believe in the true repentance of the sinner. But she is by no means perfect. She is a woman, not an angel, and her imperfections are essentially feminine. Her spotless purity reminds us of Cogen; her railing tongue, of Herminia; her fely protestation recalls Portia; her sweet forgiveness, Hermione. But in her lofty pride, f-assertive yet tender, she stands alone, a character in advance of her age, a bold claimant of the equal rights of womanhood. In Isabella, though a mere sketch, we see the touch of a master hand. Jealousy tinges her view of all her daughter-law's actions. But she is not all bad. The tragic fate of Marcelia opens her eyes to her past worthy jealousy, and at last her conscience comes awakened. Mariana is of a mean, narrow, selfish nature, absolutely destitute of all generous thoughts and impulses, and her hatred of Marcelia little else than the spite of a lower nature regards a higher. In Eugenia, Massinger has sketched a character, complex alike in motive and action, a woman of unflinching spirit and masculine will, whose cherished feelings of revenge for the wrong she has suffered are swept away by a rising flood of pity. Although it is true that these characters are, as a rule, swayed by single motives, it is also true that in action these motives are considerably modified by the circumstances which aid or retard their development: and this disproves the assertion of a writer, quoted by Hazlitt, who says that "Massinger's characters act from single motives and become what they are in spite of motives; thus differing from Shakspeare's, who act in mixed motives and are made what they are in various circumstances." In whatever way Massinger's creations differ from those of Shakspeare, there is, so far as the women in "The Duke of Milan" are concerned, abundant evidence that motive and event act and react upon each other.

PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Friday, Dec. 4.)

FRY BRADLEY, Esq., president, in the chair.—Whitley Stokes read a paper on "The Bodleian Fragment of Cormac's Glossary." This glossary is a mediæval Irish Etymologicum, attributed to Cormac, king and bishop of Cashel, who was slain in battle in the year 903, but it was probably not written much before the eleventh century. Complete copies are in the Lebar Brecc in the Yellow Book of Lecan; fragments in the Book of Leinster, a vellum of the twelfth century, and 610, a vellum in the Bodleian, written in 10; and Harl. 5280, a MS. in the British Museum. The Bodleian fragment extends from Imbas forosna Turigein (about three-sevenths of the whole glossary), and its language and spelling are far more archaic than those of the copy in the Lebar Brecc, which was published in 1862. After collecting the chief grammatical forms found in the Bodleian fragment, Mr. Stokes pointed out and translated the articles relating respectively to Irish history, folklore and mythology, manners and customs, law and romance. He then gave the following etymologies of words contained in this fragment:

1. áil, "disgrace," from agli-*, cognate with Goth. agls.
2. áiss, "growth," from pássa-, pát-to, cogn. with Gr. πάσσαι and Goth. fól an.
3. bél, "lip," from bello-s*, gvelto-s*, cogn. with Goth. giban.
4. bóthar, "road," borrowed from a British bautr*, cogn. with Skr. vi-gñti, a-gát, Gr. ἔ-βα, A.S. þar, Germ. pfad.
5. fítáim, stáim, "I am able," from srentó*, cogn. with Goth. scinþs, "strong."
6. forosna, "illuminés," from cer-od-sunnát*, cogn. with Goth. sunno.
7. luith, "champion," from plati-s*, cogn. with Gr. πλάτῃ, πλάτεις.
8. lau, "little," borrowed from a British lau* = ἔ-λαχύς, Skr. laghi.
9. lethech, a flat fish, cogn. with M.H.G. vluder, "flounder."
10. lamm, "bare," W. lucm, from lupmo-*, cogn. with O. Slav. lupiti, "detract," Lith. lupiti, "schalen."
11. luc, "steering-oar," dat. luith, from a stem lu(p)et*, cogn. with Slav. lopata, "shovel."
12. mend, "kid," cogn. with Alb. ment, "to suck," as diut, "lamb," with Lat. fē-lare, Gr. ῥή-πατο.
13. methoss, "boundary-pillar," Skr. mit, "upright post."
14. mon, "trick," Ch. Slav. manja, maniti, "trügen," "tauschen," Lith. mónai, "Trug."
15. orgin, "I destroy," Gaul. Orgeto-riz, Gr. ῥήξθω, ῥεξθεις.
16. orn, "destruction," cogn. with Gr. ἔπι, ἄρη, ἔρη, and Skr. arush, "wound," r-nó-ti.
17. pattu, "hare," gen. pattan, a loanword cogn. with Fr. patte and pataud.
18. poi, "foot," borrowed from O. Fr. por.
19. ranc, "baldness of the temples," borrowed from a British cognate of Lat. ruco.
20. robud, "forewarning," from ro = Lat. pro, and bud, cogn. with Skt. bodhāmi, Gr. πυ-ν-θάρουαι.
21. rucht, "mantle," from ruck-tu*, cogn. with Germ. Rock, Roeken, A.S. rocc, Low-Lat. roccus, whence Fr. and Eng. rocket.
22. saim, "a yoke," cogn. with Gr. ἄμα, δύο, δυοῖ, Germ. zu-sammen, Skr. samān.
23. sn, "a net" (W. hryn), from seghno-*, cogn. with Gr. ἔχω.
24. ui*, "an eulogy" (Mid. Ir. ú = a. aircetul), gen. uath, cogn. with Gr. ὑμνος (from b-μνος), and perhaps Vedic uvē.

Of these etymologies Nos. 1, 2, 10, 12, and 20 are due to Prof. Strachan; No. 15 to Dr. Per Persson, and No. 18 to Dr. Kuno Meyer. Mr. Stokes also suggested that the Latin legal term pauperies, "the damage done by an animal" (from pōp* . . .), might be cognate with Skr. pāpa, "wicked," pāpman, "sin," with which Fröhde and Wackernagel have connected Gr. πῆμα from πημα*, μημα*. For Lat. au from o see Stolz, Lat. Grammatik, p. 272. The ablaut-relation, i—o, is regular. The suffix -eries might be due to confusion with pauperies, "poverty."

NEW SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Friday, Dec. 11.)

DR. F. J. FURNIVALL in the chair.—A paper on "The Latest Objections to the Herbert-Fitton Theory of the Sonnets" was read by Mr. Thomas Tyler. A somewhat novel attack had been recently made on the position that William Herbert, who became Earl of Pembroke in 1609, was Shakspeare's friend of the Sonnets, and the "Mr. W. H." of the Dedication. Descriptions in the Sonnets were said to be inconsistent with certain portraits of Herbert. The hero of these poems was repeatedly described as "fair," a word taken to mean "of remarkably light complexion"; but Herbert, according to a portrait recently acquired by the Earl of Pembroke, was said to be swarthy. Then in the portrait the eyes were of a darkish grey; and these, it was contended, could not be the eyes which, according to Sonnet 20, "gilded the object whereupon they gazed." But are there eyes of any conceivable colour of which this could be said with propriety? It was an extravagant compliment which Shakspeare paid to his friend, clearly implying that his friend's eyes were suns. This, indeed, was expressed in Sonnet 49, "that sun, thine eye." To press such poetical similes with literalness was utterly absurd. It might as well be maintained that the breath of W. H. had exactly the odour of the violet, or at once the odour of the violet and the rose (S. 99), or that the whiteness of his hand was quite identical with that of the lily (98, 99). But, to prove Mr. W. H.'s whiteness of complexion, especial emphasis had been laid on the contrast expressed in lines 3 and 4 of Sonnet 141:

"The better angel is a man right fair
The worsor spirit a woman colour'd ill."

But the antithesis to "colour'd ill" is "colour'd well"; and this must be the meaning of "right fair," not remarkably white or blonde. As to the colour of hair considered in Shakspeare's time to be most desirable in a man, reference was made to "As You Like It" (Act iii., sc. 4.), where Celia, speaking of Orlando's hair, says: "Your chestnut was ever the only colour." Slender, of the "Merry Wives," who is evidently represented as weak and contemptible, has yellow hair, "a little yellow beard" (Act i., sc. 4.). The objector alluded to had found some difficulty in the seventh line of Sonnet 99—

"And buds of marjoram had stolen thy hair."

Buds of marjoram varied in colour, but those of a purple-red would seem to be intended. To such, the hair most admired, with a chestnut or reddish shade, made probably the nearest approach; but, from an allusion quoted by Dowden in Suckling's "Tragedy of Brennoralt" (Act iv., sc. 1.), it would seem not unlikely that wavy hair, or hair with a tendency to curl, might also be implied. Mr. Tyler had visited Wilton House to examine the portrait on which objections had been based. The person represented was undoubtedly fair, and by no means of a swarthy complexion. The colour of the hair was entirely suitable: and, though it depicted a man of an age considerably beyond the eighteen or twenty of the Sonnets, yet it was much younger than the engraving in the British Museum, published soon after Herbert's death. Dr. Furnivall had remarked a peculiar delicacy of feature in the new portrait; this suited Sonnet 20. So far was the portrait from contradicting the Herbert theory that it seemed to give important corroboration. The obvious likeness gave a strong probability of genuineness. But there was one serious drawback. The past history of the picture was almost wholly unknown. Certainly the Herbert theory had not been refuted, as had been alleged, by this portrait. With regard to the "Mr. W. H." of the Dedication as used of a nobleman, while this usage was by no means unprecedented, it should be recollected that a partial concealment was evidently intended. The use of initials only must be held to show this. Adverting to the three portraits in the collection of General Newdegate, at Arbury, in Warwickshire, said to represent Mary Fitton, Mr. Tyler admitted that if this were really the case, then Mary Fitton was not the "dark lady" of the Sonnets. But the facts presented by the portraits prevented our accepting this conclusion. One of the three portraits is inscribed with the name of "Lady Macclesfield," and another with that of the "Countess of Stamford," both of which names, it was certain, were impossible and wrong, and the third bore what appeared to be heraldic badges which had nothing to do with the Fittons. These heraldic badges probably represented the armorial bearings of the Cookes, of Gidea Hall, Romford, a member of which family, Mildred Cooke, afterwards Lady Maxey, was an intimate friend of Anne Fitton (Lady Anne Newdigate). The Cookes, in Tudor times, were persons of high distinction; and though the younger Mildred Cooke, Lady Newdigate's friend, does not appear to have been very erudite, her four aunts, Mildred, Anne, Katherine, and Elizabeth, were highly renowned for their learning. Of these ladies, Mildred married Lord Burleigh, and became the mother of Sir Robert Cecil: Anne married Sir Nicholas Bacon, and became the mother of the great Francis Bacon; and the other two sisters married very well indeed. The high distinction of the family, together with intimate friendship, gave no slight reason for there being more than one portrait of Lady Maxey at Arbury. It was clear from an endorsement on one of Lady Maxey's letters (attributed to Sir Roger Newdigate, founder of the Newdigate prize) that her name had been mistaken for "Lady Macclesfield." This alone would raise a presumption against the alleged portraits of Mary Fitton, who was never either "Lady Macclesfield" or "Countess of Stamford." The fact was, that the portraits lacked any adequate authentication. Besides, they contradicted the coloured statue of Mary Fitton, at Gawsorth, which was well-authenticated. This statue gave the black hair and dark complexion required by the Sonnets. Mr. Tyler had no hesitation in deciding in favour of the statue, after personal visits to both Arbury and Gawsorth. While it could not be allowed that the portraits at Arbury represented Mary Fitton, there were letters there of great importance. Her character was described by her relations in language very much like in intensity the strong expressions of the Sonnets. In one of these letters is found a description which could scarcely be surpassed, "the vilest woman under the sun." Confirmation, also, was given of an inference Mr. Tyler had drawn from a letter in Lord Salisbury's possession, written in May, 1601, by Mary Fittou's father, on a journey he was making with his daughter into Cheshire some three months after the birth of her child, of which the Earl of Pembroke (William Herbert) was said to be the father. It appeared that Mary's father had been trying to bring about a marriage between his daughter and Pembroke, and that the latter had refused on the ground of Mary's want of "honesty." Then ensued some discussion or investigation of her conduct. It now appears, from one of the Arbury letters, that Mary and her father had gone off secretly into Cheshire, things having apparently become too warm in London. What had been said or done had caused some even of her friends to cease to interest themselves on her behalf. Sir Francis Fitton (her uncle) could see nothing but what was bad. It was probably at this time that Shakspeare did a service to Pembroke by giving his testimony concerning Mary Fitton's character. This probably healed the difference previously existing between the poet and his patron, and Shakspeare began again to address Pembroke (Sonnet 100). The suggestion may not be altogether agreeable, but it suits the chronology exactly: and the truth is not always pleasant.

FINE ART.

John Leech: his Life and Work. By W. P. Frith, R.A. (Bentley.)

A GOOD opportunity seems to have been to some extent lost when the task of writing the life of the ever popular John Leech was confided by Messrs. Bentley to the aged though brisk Academician, Mr. Frith. I doubt, indeed, whether there is a single art-writer of importance who would have had patience to fill the needful couple of volumes with a lengthy discussion on the subject of the present memoir; for the art that is chiefly humorous lends itself very little to literary treatment, and, moreover—in my own opinion, at all events—John Leech has really been a little over-rated. Is there anything fresh—in the way of praise, I mean, or in the way of favourable and sympathetic analysis—that remains to be said about him? One may be a little doubtful; still, in any case, some treatment more subtle and more qualified than that which was at the command of Mr. Frith was surely desirable. Mr. Frith, who is eminently good natured—except when he is attacking that authoritative criticism which has put his own work into its proper, I dare not add its "comfortable," place—is, at his best, superficial. As a writer he is full of dull repetitions; and an essential commonness is, I greatly fear, the characteristic of his style. If anything could indispose us to receive the best of what John Leech—sunny John Leech, dear John Leech, as in his last days his then youthful friend Mr. Du Maurier called him—if anything, I say, could indispose us to receive the best of what John Leech has to offer, it would be that method of handling which is pursued by Mr. Frith.

Poor Mr. Frith—to do him justice—he has not had much material. The Dean of Rochester, who would have written the Life so much better—nay, who it is to be hoped may yet write it—is the possessor of a hundred letters addressed to him, which are of a very different quality, in all probability, from many of those trivial little notes—de circonstance, indeed—which Mr. Frith, with unflinching geniality and undeterred self-satisfaction, has included in the present publication. Mr. Frith is an avowed raconteur. It is necessary to him that he shall tell a story—desirable that he shall tell a succession of stories. These stories have sustained—some of them not unworthily—his reputation in these later days. He has always had an eye for the dramatic. Well, in the couple of bulky volumes professedly on John Leech, Mr. Frith's stories are, actually, not seldom; about John Leech. Not seldom also they are not. Not seldom they are principally about Mr. Frith. We don't resent them very much, even when they are; for Mr. Frith is garrulous so amiably. But—stretch our complaisance as much as we will—we cannot accept them as the exact equivalent of serious criticism or of painstaking narration.

As regards the illustrations, they are, let it be said ungrudgingly, both ample and varied. People who do not quite share my own opinion as to the comparative unsatisfactoriness of comic drawing—people who do not think, as I think, that a little of it often goes a long way—will feast fully on all the good things which the enterprise and the good fortune of the Messrs. Bentley have enabled them to provide. And even those of us who are not really stirred by the very smartest achievements of comic design will recognise, in their due place—and will recognise as valuable—other qualities in Leech than those of the merely funny illustrator. Grace and fancy he of course had in abundance, and occasionally there is the touch of tragic force.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

THE REVIVED INTEREST IN BOOK-PLATES.

THE sixth—the December—number of the Journal of the Ex Libris Society is distinctly the best that has yet been issued. It shows a marked improvement in the quality of its illustrations, as may be seen by a comparison of certain of the reproductions formerly given with the excellently crisp and sharp rendering of the armorial book-plate of Malherbe, the poet, in the present issue. But the treasure of the number is its frontispiece—book-plate of Mr. Gleeson-White, designed by Mr. C. Ricketts "of Chelsea." Strongly tinged with the influence of Blake, notwithstanding the symbolical figure of Night which it includes, the design has enough that is spontaneous and original; and it certainly ranks as a fine example of modern decoration, produced in a—but not slavish—subordination to the tradition of the great decorative periods of the past.

In a communication published in a recent number of the Journal, Mr. Vicars, of Dulwich, made a good suggestion, in recommending that the scope of the periodical should be extended so as to embrace heraldry in general, as distinguished from genealogy. It might also be suggested that the Ex Libris Journal should devote a very substantial portion of its space to bookplates as are artistic and decorative in work and workmanship; for—sad to say—too many bookplates, both old and present-day, have little attractiveness to the mere lover of books. If such emphasis as we indicate were given to the artistic side of its subject, the Journal would command the larger suffrage of all interested in art and decoration. We should, accordingly, strongly advise that an assistant art-editor, affiliated with Mr. Jewers, who already, as assistant heraldic-editor, aids Mr. W. H. Wright, the hon. secretary and general editor.

An Ex Libris Society has been started in Germany, with Berlin for its headquarters. Herr Friedrich Warnecke, compiler of the valuable Heraltische Kunstblätter, for its president—than whom none could be better. The society, too, has already commenced the publication of a journal dealing with its subject.

A further proof of the fervour of the recently awakened interest in Ex Libris is furnished by the fact that Mr. Quaritch is about to issue a series of facsimiles, by Mr. Griggs, of our British book-plates—his first series is a well-nigh unprocurable. The projected set will be devoted to the book-plates of archbishops and bishops, beginning with the fine and coloured Ex Libris of Cardinal Wolsey. The series may be useful to the Rev. Mr. Woodcock in the preparation of his work upon Episcopate Heraldry, for which students of the subject—some of them at least—are looking eagerly.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BABYLONIAN STANDARD WEIGHT.

Cairo: Dec. 7, 1891.

MR. Greville Chester has become the possessor of a very remarkable relic of antiquity, discovered in Babylonia, probably on the site of Babylon. It is a large weight of hard green stone, highly polished, and of a cone-like form. The picture of an altar has been engraved upon it, and down one side runs a cuneiform inscription of ten lines. They read as follows:

"One maneh standard weight, the property of Merodach-sar-ilani, a duplicate of the weight which Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, the son of Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, made in accordance with the weight [prescribed] by the deified Dungi, a former king."

The historical importance of the inscription is obvious at the first glance. Dungi was the son and successor of Ur-Bagas, and his reign may be roughly assigned to about 3000 B.C. It would appear that he had fixed the standard of weight in Babylonia; and the actual weight made by him in accordance with this standard seems to have been preserved down to the time of Nebuchadrezzar, who caused a duplicate of it to be made. The duplicate again bears the standard by which all other weights in the country had to be tested.

The fact that Dungi is called "the deified" is not surprising. We know of other early kings of Chaldea who were similarly raised to the rank of gods. One of them prefixes the title of "divine" to his name on his own bricks; another, Naram-Sin, the son of Sargon, Accad, is called "a god" on the seal of an individual who describes himself as his worshipper." It is possible that in this cult certain Babylonian kings have an evidence of early intercourse with Egypt.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

It is to be feared, we hear, that there is little probability of the acquisition by the Government for the proposed "National Gallery of English Art" of that site on the Embankment which is so much more central and so much more convenient than any other that has been seriously entertained.

MESSRS. DEPPEZ & GUTEKUNST, the experts of Green-street, Leicester-square, will shortly issue a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Frederick Wedmore's Méryon. While Mr. Wedmore's now well-known critical essay will remain much as it was originally written, and it has been several times republished, the chapter entitled "Notes for the Amateur" will be brought up to date; and, for the convenience of collectors, a list of the prices fetched in recent years by Méryon's rarer etchings will be appended. This edition, like the last, will be limited in number.

A SMALL collection of the works of M. Degas—the possessions, we hear, of an enterprising Scotch dealer of the modern school—will be on view immediately in private rooms in Old Bond-street. Apropos of this, we may be allowed to add that the statement made in some quarters that M. Degas now on view at the new English Art Club is the first that has been seen publicly in England must not go unchallenged. We believe that M. Deschamps exhibited more than one Degas many years ago, when he had exhibitions of French art in Old Bond-street; and it is not in the least likely that Degas was represented in the very interesting Exhibition of French Impressionists' work which the Messrs. Dowdeswell organised now several years ago, and which was perhaps the only systematic attempt that has yet been made to display in London the aims and achievements of the school.

MR. GEORGE DU MAURIER has just commenced a lecture tour through the provinces. The subject is "Social Pictorial Satire" as depicted in the pages of Punch during the last fifty years, by Doyle, Leech, Keene, and the lecturer himself.

AFTER being unduly neglected, the coins of Southern India (which have very little connection with those of the North) are now giving special attention. Not to mention the catalogues of Mr. E. Thurston (superintendent of the Madras Museum), and the useful Hints to Collectors of Capt. R. H. C. Tufnell, two papers have recently appeared in periodicals. In the Indian Antiquary for September, Dr. E. H. Hertsch, of Bangalore, gives a list of the coins which may be referred to the Rajas of Vijayanagar, the last Hindu empire of Southern India, with a description of the figures and symbols, and an interpretation of the legends. This paper is illustrated with two excellent autotype plates, reproduced from plaster casts made by the late curator of the Mysore Museum. In the Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay (vol. ii., No. 5)—which we may say, in passing, frequently contains most interesting matter—Mr. T. J. Symonds writes on the copper coins of the Nawabs of the Karnatik, the last Mahomedan dynasty of the South. Apart from their rarity, these coins are curious as exhibiting a rapid degeneracy in the hands of Tamil moneyers who evidently could not read Persian, and who were always desirous to replace the original legends with the sacred objects of Hinduism. This paper is also illustrated with a lithographed plate from drawings by Capt. Tufnell.

NEXT week there will be on view in the Goupil Gallery, New Bond-street, Mr. Hugh de T. Glazebrook's Salon picture, entitled "C'est l'Empereur"; and Messrs. A. Stephens & Co. will open an exhibition of British silks and Oriental embroideries in Regent-street.

THE STAGE.

THE theatrical year has two sleepy seasons: one of them lasts from July to September, the other is the month before Christmas. From this second slumber of its year the stage awakes next week, and within the next two or three weeks some important things will have been produced. We shall have, to begin with, the great Shakesperian revival at the Lyceum, towards which Mr. Irving is bending all his energies. We shall have the return of Mr. Thorne to the Vaudeville, with the new serious play by Mr. Haddon Chambers. We shall have a comedy by Mr. Comyns Carr—almost his first original stage work, we fancy—at the St. James's, from which the melodrama at present presented is about to be withdrawn. We shall have the new production at the Garrick. And what else shall we not have?

Meanwhile, nothing has been doing. We ourselves might have been seen, one night this week, in the stalls of the Garrick—a theatre which, like Brighton, in the words of M. Théodore Roussel, is "un bien honnête endroit." We were innocently witnessing one of the very last performances of Mr. T. W. Robertson's pretty charade called "School." You cannot judge the piece seriously. The better you know it, the slighter it seems. What is supposed to be the graver interest—the love affair of the pupil-teacher and of Lord Beaufof—is altogether a failure, unless you are willing to smile rather than be moved by it; and two out of the four "curtains" are inadequate to the last degree in serious comedy. Yet, for all that, the piece has merit. The character of the aged Beau—a padded man who wears the stays—and who thinks that, since the soul is immortal, the resources of art should prolong to some extent the attractiveness of the body—the character of the aged Beau, we say, is well drawn. And there is in the very central character—that of Naomi Tighe, the hoiden heiress—a freshness and wonderful capacity for being utilised to good effect by the actress playing the part. This actress, in the present case, is Miss Annie Hughes, who, with a full right, and with great charm, succeeds to the rôle which was Mrs. Bancroft's a generation ago. Miss Hughes is, indeed, quite admirable. Her liveliness is continuous, yet excellently varied; her resources are amazing. Mr. Hare was absent, we are sorry to say; and the part of Beau Farintosh requires this Gerard Dou, this Meissonier, of an actor to perfectly fill it. Mr. Mackintosh, clever man as he is, cannot make very much of it. His physique unfits him for it. And as regards the moral lesson sought to be conveyed by the Beau's change of attire, that is in any case ridiculous, but Mr. Hare makes it less so than anybody else. What real moral dignity does the character gain when, in exchange for the neat and engaging attire which accompany the stays, the rouge, and the dyed hair, he assumes a rather seedy old-fashioned frock coat, an ugly black stock, and a pair of trousers with black and chocolate stripes. Young Mr. Gilbert Hare is really excellent in the part of Krux—the little villain of the charade is a villain who bears the same proportion to the villain of melodrama that a chessman knight bears to a knight with accoutrements at Cluny. The personality of young Mr. Irving is extremely agreeable, and he plays Lord Beaufof with frankness and already with a measure of style. Miss Fanny Robertson is a very good school-mistress of the older type. Miss Kate Rorke—though she looks well, naturally, and gives evidence that she is possessed of some knowledge of her craft—has seldom been seen, artistically speaking, less to her advantage than in the character of Bella. She plays it for the most part too heavily: charges it with more than it will bear. She wants simplicity in the part, and a measure of lightness—the touch of the charade, in fine. But, whatever were the defects and disappointments of the performance, the evening, as a whole, was spent charmingly; and we may hope shortly to repair to the Garrick again to see a bigger piece.

We hear from more than one most excellent authority that the public "costume recital"—in reality a carefully prepared performance—by the Shakespeare Reading Society of "Measure for Measure," was of so notable a kind that it would be absolutely regrettable in the interests of art if this performance were not repeated during this winter, and in a place more accessible than the Ultima Thule of Notting Hill. The cast had been most carefully chosen; and Mr. William Poel more than ever distinguished himself, not only as a Shakesperian scholar and as a master of elocution, but as a stage manager. And he and his company—if we may call them so—were most of all successful in proving that a play, whose interest had hitherto been considered by the playgoer to depend upon one or two characters, and one or two scenes, is in reality interesting from end to end as an actable drama.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

Mlle. YRRAC, a young lady violinist, Dutch by birth, gave a concert at Princes' Hall on December 10. She played, with Herr Schönberger, Greig's Sonata (Op. 8), and at once made a satisfactory impression. Her tone is full, her intonation perfect; she plays with passion, and will no doubt, with time, acquire the necessary tenderness. It was a treat to hear an artist so utterly free from sickly sentimentality and tricks of any kind. Her first solo was a Theme with Variations by Tartini. Mlle. Gherlsen, the vocalist, has a good voice and good style. Herr Schönberger performed some solos by Brahms and Chopin in his best manner.

A concert was given at St. James's Hall on December 11, for the benefit of the North London Hospital. When charity is the object, it often has to cover sins more or less numerous. On this occasion, however, an excellent performance of Spohr's now seldom heard "Last Judgment" was given, with Miss A. Williams and Messrs. Lloyd and R. Newman as solo vocalists. The second part consisted of an interesting selection of vocal and instrumental music from the works of Handel.

Two Quartets and four Gipsy Songs form the contents of Brahms's latest published work (Op.

112) which was produced at the last Monday Popular Concert. Music that can be followed without any mental effort on the part of the listener is not always appreciated at its proper value; and these songs are so smooth, so flowing, and, besides, so brief, that one can scarcely realise the fact that the composer must have spent time and trouble over them: they are trifles, but valuable ones. They are all highly characteristic of the composer; so much so, indeed, that there seems more of the "Brahms" than of the "Gipsy" element in the second set. These "Gipsy" songs have fresh and graceful melodies, supported by delicate harmonies. They were admirably rendered by Mmes. Henschel and Fassett, and Messrs. Shakespeare and Henschel. The Quartets were repeated, and also a portion of the second set; the former were sung in the first, the latter in the second part of the programme. Miss Adelina de Lara played Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, but the task was somewhat beyond her strength. Her intentions, however, were good, and in some of the lighter variations she succeeded in creating a favourable impression. Mme. Neruda played with great success an Adagio of Mozart's, and the composer's orchestral accompaniments were represented by a pianoforte arrangement. It may be questioned whether it is wise to introduce transcriptions of this kind; for however clever the pianoforte arrangement may be, the composer's colouring is lost. The concert opened with a fine performance of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74).

The programme of the Bach Choir concert on Tuesday evening included two specimens of sacred music, one of the eighteenth, the other of the nineteenth century—Mozart's "Requiem," and the closing part of the first Act of "Parsifal." The former, a broken column in the temple of art, served to remind us of what the master, under more favourable conditions, might have achieved in the department of sacred music; while the latter brought vividly before the minds of the listeners the difference between the old style and the new. The performance of the Requiem was dignified; and the solo vocalists, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Messrs. Houghton and Plunket Greene, all sang with feeling and fervour. The continuation of the solo in the "Tuba mirum," usually assigned to the bassoon, was played by the trombone; this is supposed to be the correct reading, anyhow it is more striking when thus given. Trombone parts were played in the "Dies Irae"; they are not marked in the "André" edition of the score which professes to show the wind parts added by Süßmayer, and they seem to take away from the effect of the trombone solo in the following "Tuba mirum." The performance of the excerpt from "Parsifal" was, on the whole, a great success. Some of the movements were slightly hurried, the "bells" were too loud and two much in evidence; but the choir sang well, and Mr. Plunket Greene, (Gurnemann and Titrel) and Mr. Henschel (Amfortas) both interpreted their parts with true feeling and great dramatic power. It would be absurd to pretend that a concert-room performance of the music is satisfactory: that is impossible. But when it is given with the care and reverence bestowed on it by Dr. Stanford, it seems as if the end justified the means; and the end in this case is to give to many musicians who cannot go to Bayreuth an opportunity of hearing something of Wagner's wonderful music-drama. The excerpt was performed amid perfect silence, and produced a great impression. Dr. V. Stanford has every reason to be satisfied with the result of his labours. A note in the programme-book explains why a so-called Bach Society should give a programme without any Bach music; its aims, we are informed, are more catholic than many have been led by its name to suppose. The explanation is a thoroughly sensible one.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

WE have received from Messrs. Metzler & Co.:

Two Songs: For Eternity and Love's Dial, by Mrs. Harding Cox. The words are sentimental, and the music is of a similar character; the second is the better of the two, and, in its way, rather neat. A Winter Love Song, by Lawrence Kellie, has a certain grace and charm, but the same synopacted accompaniment for the three stanzas proves wearisome. The Story of our Love, by E. Cutler, is a song of familiar type, but, of its kind, effective. Les Papillons, by A. Goring Thomas, is a light and extremely graceful song; the words by Gautier have been well translated by Mr. F. T. Marzials. One Word, by Minnie Cochrane, is a plain ballad with usual triplet ending. The Mistress of my Heart and Gavotte in Grey, by Reginald de Koven. The first is smooth and flowing; the second is light and graceful. The words tell of a "dainty pair" engaged in playing chess; the maiden's heart, not the game, is won. Last Night in Dreamland, by Lawrence Kellie. The melody is smooth, and some of the strains are not unfamiliar; the accompaniment is effective. Chanson d'Avril, by B. Godard, is a pleasing dainty song. There is an English version of the French words by Ch. d'Orléans (XV^e siècle). Sous Bois, by B. Godard, is an effective pianoforte piece. The opening pastoral theme is charming; the middle section of the piece is not so fresh, although as contrast it is successful. The coda is clever and taking. Osmunda, Intermezzo, by W. Williams, is a tame, commonplace pianoforte piece. Miriam, by C. Kottaun, is another Intermezzo of plain character. The bass is singularly monotonous. Indian Summer Waltz, by C. Lowthian, is a good piece for the ball-room. The American Organ Journal, Nos. 16 and 17, edited by J. Munro Coward. Part 16 contains some selections from Mendelssohn's "Athaliae," including a "Fragment of Overture"—in fact, only the first eighteen bars. Schumann's "Thema" from his Op. 68, probably for facility in reading, has been written in common instead of 2-4 time. Mr. H. M. Higgs contributes a pleasing "Sketch." Part 17 contains some light and agreeable pieces. These transcriptions for the American organ are well done. Metzler's Red Album contains an excellent selection of marches, including the one from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," the one from "Tannhäuser," and the Bridal March from "Lohengrin"; their Christmas Album some bright and popular dances; and their Christmas Album of Dance Music for the Violin the same pieces for violin alone.

From Messrs. Hutchings & Romer—

With the Light, by Lilia Green. The melody of this song is rather commonplace, but there are one or two pleasing touches in the accompaniment. The Gates of Paradise, by Cotford Dick, is a straightforward ballad; one passage recalls Mendelssohn, but this will scarcely interfere with the popularity of the song. Until, by Clement Lackmane, is a simple ballad, but what little merit it has is spoilt by the commonplace ending. But the insipid words about "angels" and the "Jasper sea" may perhaps account for the music. By the way, the title of the song has scarcely an enchanting sound. There is no reason why this particular song should be specially held up for condemnation, but it may stand for a type of songs with titles as brief as they are meaningless. Sing to me in the Twilight, words music by S. Hannam. This is a feeble waltz time. Can you tell, by F. Manly. words tell of a broken heart, of prayer, of in God, but the music has scarcely a religious character. Fleur de Lys, by Fred J. Har. This is a pianoforte piece entitled "gavotte," but it does not commence according to gavotte rule, nor is the music in gavotte style. Early Morn, a pastoral sketch for piano by J. F. Barnett, a well-written, and especially pleasing piece.

SPACIAL AND ATOMIC ENERGY.

Part III.—HEAT.

By FREDERICK MAJOR.

Price 7s. 6d.

in a standpoint that matter ethereal and terrestrial varies only on account of the manner of its concretion into rigid atoms enforced cohesion. Atomic and molecular forces attributed to respiration, imparted by ethereal gas energy and Gravitation affects attending "respirative" rise and fall imposed upon the "earth's surface."

The cause of Atomic and Molecular Action, Terrestrial Heat, Dew-point Cold, the Tides, Expansion and Contraction of Gases, Electric states, Latent Heat, Combustion, and Explosion explained upon the above principles without according innate elastic, active, or fluid qualities to any matter.

"This is a learned dissertation of some 600 pages on the important subject, Heat. The author avoids mathematical formulæ, his intention merely being to seek a full explanation of known facts by close reasoning. To effect his purpose he calls to his aid man's extensive knowledge of natural phenomena, taking his subject in a skilful and methodical manner. One of the most interesting chapters is that on 'Combustion,' and here the author's knowledge and literary power appear at their best. His views on the theory of combustion are readily understood. The atomic and molecular theories are naturally the subject of much discussion, as well as the relation of the different states of matter, the cause which brings about change of state."—Glasgow Herald.

"The work is one of a thoroughly scientific character, and in his treatment of a hard subject the writer has been happy both in his style and selection of illustrations and description of experiments. The volume on 'Heat' embraces the whole field of a great and most interesting set, and students of science—particularly of applied sciences—will extend to it a thorough welcome."—Scientist.

HOWATT, Author of "The Children's Angel." Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"It will be heartily welcomed. The subjects are well selected; the style is always simple and forcible, and the lessons which the preacher desires to impress upon the mind are of very youthful reader may appreciate. The sermons have another merit—that of brevity. A child may read them with a good deal of pleasure, and, it need hardly be said, will profit."—Scotsman.

THE SHIELD, the SWORD, and the BATTLE. By the Rev. George Everard, M.A. Third Edition.

THE BUFFALO RUNNERS. A Tale of the Red River Plains. By R. M. Ballantyne. With Six Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s.

"In 'The Buffalo Runners' Mr. Ballantyne is at his best."—Academy.

"Mr. Ballantyne has written a capital story, full of incident and adventure, hunting and Indian fighting, and yet not deficient in domestic interest. There is not a dull page in it."
"Mr. Ballantyne tells an admirable story of 'the struggle for life' valiantly and victoriously fought by the early colonists of the Red River region in North-Western America. As scene of this thrilling narrative he has chosen the very ground upon which the populous and prosperous city of Winnipeg stands at the present day."—Daily Telegraph.

A COXSWAIN'S BRIDE; or, The Rising Tide: and Other Tales. By R. M. Ballantyne. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

"It will certainly take rank as one of the best books that Mr. Ballantyne has ever given to the boys of England."—City Press.

"It has a stirring plot of adventure among storms at sea, and of rescuing a lost man from a distant island."—Scotsman.

THOSE THREE; or, Little Wings. A Story for Girls. By Emma Marshall. With Six Illustrations.
Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"A simple story charmingly told. It would be difficult to find fault with a book in which there is not a single dull page, which is absolutely free from 'goody-goody' piiggishness, the high moral tone of which is no less commendable than its pure and graceful literary style."—Daily Telegraph.

"Bright and attractive and well worth reading."—Athenaeum.

IN the PURPLE. By Emma Marshall. With Four Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"A graphically written book with the characters carefully and individually delineated."—Church Bell.

"Few girls will fail to find the book of absorbing interest, and as a capital domestic story it would hold the attention of readers of maturer years."—Scotsman.

"A good story well told. It may be cordially recommended."—Record.

MY LADY BOUNTIFUL. By Emma Marshall. With Four Illustrations. Small crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

"My Lady Bountiful' is touching and very pretty."—Times.

"Mrs. Marshall is at her best in this story. All the characters are thoroughly well drawn and individualised, and exercise an influence more or less strong in the progress of the story."

"A very clever story. The heroine is charmingly drawn."—Public Opinion.

"The reader's interest never flags."—Academy.

"The story enforces an excellent moral, and is generally attractive."—Spectator.

THE DALRYMPLES. By Agnes Giberne. With Four Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"A very readable story."—Times.

"The tale is simply all that a tale should be. It is full of incident and amusement, and at the same time introduces life lessons which are well worth learning."—News.

ABOVE BOARD. A Tale of Adventure on the Sea. By William Charles Metcalfe. With Six Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"This is a delightfully exciting tale of the adventures of two sailor lads, with icebergs, pirates, and similar horrors of the sea. Its chief defect is that it leaves off too soon, even at end of more than 200 pages."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"This story of a cruise is about as full of adventures as it can well be. There is plenty of 'go' in the narrative, and the incidents succeed each other with a very plausible probability."

WORK, WAIT, WIN. By Ruth Lamb, Author of "One Little Vein of Dross," &c. With Six Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"A pleasant, wholesome story."—Spectator.

"A grand book for boys who have to make their way in the world."—Newbury House Magazine.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

Just Published, crown 8vo, price 9s.

ELAGOA BAY: its NATIVES and NATURAL HISTORY. By ROSE MONTEIRO. With 20 Illustrations after the Author's Sketches and from the Natural Objects by A. B. and E. C. Woodward. Also a limited number with Frontispiece of New African Butterflies, beautifully hand-coloured. Price 12s.

Only the whole of the Illustrations of Insects and Plants represent entirely new species never before figured.

THE ATHENÆUM says:—"Mrs. Monteiro gives us a very intelligent, sympathetic, and most readable account of an interesting region. Is strong as a naturalist, and stronger still, perhaps, as an entomologist. This is a wholly delightful book, and the illustrations delightful."

Fifth Edition (Sixth Thousand).

GIRL in the KARPATHIANS. By Ménie MURIEL NORMAN (Miss DOWIE). Crown 8vo, illustrated, price 3s. 6d. The TIMES says:—"She sometimes reminds us of 'The Sentimental Journey'—more so than of Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson with his donkey in the Cevennes—eminently readable."

Second Edition (Third Thousand).

OME LIFE on an OSTRICH FARM. By Annie MARTIN. Crown 8vo, with 11 Illustrations, 3s. 6d.

The ATHENÆUM says:—"One of the most charming descriptions of African experience that have come under the notice of the reviewer, weary of book-making and padding. The work does not contain a dull page."

CROSS EAST AFRICAN GLACIERS: an Account of the First Ascent of Mount Kilimanjaro. By Dr. HANS MEYER. 1 vol., super-royal 8vo, 450 pp., containing upwards of 40 Illustrations, consisting of Photographs, Heliogravures, and Coloured Frontispiece in aquarelle, accompanied by 3 Coloured Maps. With Appendix and Scientific Notes dealing with the Geological, Botanical, and Entomological Results of the Expedition. In handsome cloth binding, gilt top, price 32s.

A limited number of Large-Paper Copies, on Japanese Vellum, with Engraved Plates in Duplicate, signed by the Author, may still be obtained. Price on application.

The ATHENÆUM says:—"The production of the English edition deserves all praise. It well translated, beautifully illustrated, and adequately supplied with maps."

The TIMES says:—"The series of 'The World's Great Explorers' is an improvement on others of the same kind. The heroes of the volumes are made the central figures in consecutive narratives of exploration and discovery. Moreover, the writers of these volumes have been specially selected for exceptional knowledge of their subjects."

LEGENDARY FICTIONS of the IRISH CELTS,

Collected and Narrated by PATRICK KENNEDY.

DAILY NEWS.—"Will, we trust, find numerous readers in Great Britain. The collector and narrator of these legends and stories has evidently been engaged in a labour of genuine love. He appears to tell the tales exactly as he heard them told, which adds a curious piquancy and even verisimilitude to the narrative."

SPACIAL AND ATOMIC ENERGY.

Part III.—HEAT.
By FREDERICK MAJOR.

Price 7s. 6d.

From a standpoint that in matter (ethereal and terrestrial) varies only on account of the manner of its concretion into rigidities by enforced cohesion. Atomic and molecular forces attributed to respiration, imparted by ethereal gas energy and Gravitation to effects attending "respirative" rise and fall imposed upon the "earth's surface."

The cause of Atomic and Molecular Action, Terrestrial Heat, Dew-point Cold, the Tides, Expansion and Contraction of the Electric states, Latent Heat, Combustion, and Explosion explained upon the above principles without according necessity to attractive, or fluid qualities to any matter.

"This is a learned dissertation of some 600 pages on the important subject, Heat. The author avoids mathematical formulae, his intention apparently being to seek a full explanation of known facts by close reasoning. To effect his purpose he calls to his aid man's extensive knowledge of natural phenomena, taking his subject in a skilful and methodical manner. One of the most interesting chapters is that on 'Combustion', and here the author's knowledge and literary power appear at their best. His views on the theory of combustion are readily understood. The atomic and molecular theories are naturally the subject of much discussion, as well as the relation of the different states of matter and the cause which brings about change of state."—Glasgow Herald.

"The work is one of a thoroughly scientific character, and in his treatment of a hard subject the writer has been happy both in his selection of illustrations and description of experiments. The volume on 'Heat' embraces the whole field of a great and most interesting subject, and students of science—particularly of applied science—will extend to it a thorough welcome."—Scotsman.

"WHAT WAS IT?"

By GRETA ARMEAR.

PREFACE.—"I have been induced to write this history of personal experience, as so many people are engrossed in the subject of spirit-world. No sooner do I put forward of the mysteries of this tale, than simply tell what actually happened with regard to the unseen presence, the truth of which I can prove. To those who have studied spiritualism I leave the explanation; to me the matter is shrouded in mystery. The facts are here, the rest I put in the hands of the reader."

"TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN": Pitt. By Lord Rosebery. (Macmillans.)

The prominent position Lord Rosebery occupies in the public estimation and the confidence reposed in him by a not inconsiderable section of the Liberal party will, doubtless, give to this little volume a much greater popularity than that which any monograph of a purely literary sort could reasonably hope to enjoy. Nor is it any disparagement either to the book or to the series to which it belongs to say that it will be read more for Lord Rosebery's sake than for Pitt's. Most of us (if we have any interest at all in the subject) have already made up our minds in regard to Pitt, but we are all more or less anxious to know more of Lord Rosebery. And, in this respect, no subject could furnish us with better opportunities of gauging his mind on some of the crucial points of modern statesmanship than a critical biography of the great minister who ruled England, for good or bad, with almost absolute authority during a period when Europe was passing through the throes of a revolution which obliterated all the ancient landmarks of European politics, and of which the effects are still present with us. This, as tending to increase its popularity, is to be added a bright and elegant style of writing, which makes even annual budgets and sinking funds interesting reading. Piquancy, however, has a tendency to degenerate into vulgarity; and it must be confessed that Lord Rosebery occasionally touches the limits of good taste in this respect. But George Meredith himself never turned a neater sentence than his on Warren Hastings: "He was amushed by the undying rancour of Francis and the sleepless humanity of Burke." The picture of Fox at p. 32, and the local colouring to the scene at p. 59, are excellent examples of Lord Rosebery's ability to give life with picturesque effect. But though there can hardly be said to be a dull page in the book, the effect of the whole would have been improved by closer revision, and the omission altogether of chap. xii., which, from serving the purpose designed, "of giving the reader a glimpse of the true Pitt as recorded by himself," has the appearance of a very inartistic device to drag in certain very interesting original letters from Pitt to Lord Wellesley.

The political career of Pitt falls naturally into two parts—that which precedes and that which follows the declaration of war with France. But there is a danger in following this division for biographical purposes of one part overbalancing the other. In the one case it is Pitt the minister of war, "the pilot that weathered the storm"; in the other it is Pitt, the advocate of peace, retrenchment, and reform that is held up for our admiration. Both these phases have had their day, with the perhaps not very unnatural result that it is now the fashion to decry him in both respects. Fortunately, Lord Rosebery has fallen into none of these errors; and though his language in the earlier portion of the book is somewhat uncertain—if, indeed, we are to attach any significance to the passage, "Historians have hardly done justice to the dogged determination with which Pitt ignored the French Revolution," which to me is altogether unintelligible—he clearly recognises the paramount importance of the French Revolution in moulding Pitt's later policy.

"No man," he says, "can understand Pitt without saturating himself with the French Revolution, and endeavouring to consider it as it must have seemed at its first appearance. In the first five years he had not to deal with it, and they were fruitful years for England. . . . But the new element clouded the whole firmament. . . . We are now able to fix epochs in the French Revolution, to fancy we can measure its forces. . . . It is all cut and dried; a delicate speculation of infinite science and interest, though critical minds may differ as to its value. But Pitt could only perceive the heavens darkened, and the sound of a rushing mighty wind that filled all Europe. . . . Pitt faced the cataclysm, and made everything subservient to the task of averting it. All reforms were put on one side, till the barometer should rise to a more promising level."

This is the exact truth, and it has never been more clearly and more forcibly expressed. Pitt was essentially a peace minister. His chief, one may almost say his sole, interest lay in his financial schemes for the restoration of English credit. War to him was a misfortune to be avoided at almost any price. His wishes in this respect blinded his eyes at first to the real significance of the French Revolution. He would have ignored it had he been able to do so; but it was only for the traditional Marquis de l'Aigle, who snapped his fingers at it, and went on hunting as usual, that such a happy fate was reserved. War with France sooner or later was inevitable, and it is to Pitt's credit that he postponed it to the last possible moment. He believed the war would be of short duration; and though Burke proved a truer prophet in this respect, Pitt had excellent grounds for his belief. When the full extent of the catastrophe became visible, he bent all his energies to avert it; and it is in this light that we must judge his suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, his Treasonable Practices and Seditious Mutiny Bills, and the Act of Union itself. The price paid, of which the trebling of the national debt was the least important, was exorbitant; but it may safely be said that there was no alternative policy. Those who talk otherwise forget that the war was in the truest sense a national war. Pitt was far from being an ideal war minister, but he was a popular minister, and only a popular minister could have saved the situation.

If in the latter part of his administration Pitt's policy is altogether dominated by the French Revolution, the motive principle in the former is his desire to repair the ravages created by the war with America, and by re-establishing the shattered credit of the empire to restore England to the position of a first-rate European power. The establishment of a sinking fund for the extinction of the national debt, the substitution of an improved system of taxation which should render smuggling unprofitable, and a liberal application of the free trade principles of Adam Smith, especially in regard to Ireland, were the means by which he hoped to carry this policy into effect. In regard to the second of these items—an improved system of taxation—the success of his policy has never, so far as I am aware, been impugned. Fox himself admitted the efficacy of his measures for the suppression of smuggling, and it is almost impossible to exaggerate the benefits that followed from the consolidation of the different branches of customs and excise. The dazzling but absolutely fallacious prospects held out by the sinking fund has somewhat obscured its real merits; but the opinion of Frere, quoted by Lord Rosebery, is interesting as showing that its chief value in Pitt's estimation was as a means of inducing the nation to submit to the irksome and unpopular operation of paying off its debts. Of the commercial treaty with France, which, in the opinion of a distinguished historian, constitutes Pitt's chief title to legislative fame, Lord Rosebery remarks:

"Nothing in all Pitt's career is more remarkable and more creditable than the bold disregard of narrow prejudice and the large conciliatory spirit which he displayed in framing and concluding this treaty."

This is quite true, only I would venture to add that his attempt—though it unfortunately proved unsuccessful—to extend to Ireland the benefits of a commercial equality with England, as the "best means of uniting the two countries by the firmest and most indissoluble bonds," is at least entitled to an equal share of praise. The scheme failed through the selfish prejudice of the English manufacturing interest and the rancorous opposition of Fox. But there are certain critics who, while acknowledging the inestimable benefit that would have accrued to both nations from it, persist in ascribing its failure to a want of firmness on the part of Pitt, though it does not clearly appear whether this firmness, the want of which they deplore, ought to have taken the form of forcing the original propositions down the throat of the English, or the amended propositions down that of the Irish Parliament. To these critics I would commend the following analysis of the House of Commons, dated May 1, 1788, recently discovered among the papers of one of Pitt's private secretaries, than which, as Lord Rosebery observes, no document serves to throw more light on the political system of that period. I quote the document as it is given by Lord Rosebery:—

"In it the 'party of the Crown' is estimated at 185 members. 'This party includes all those who would probably support His Majesty's government under any minister not peculiarly unpopular.' 'The independent or unconnected members of the House' are calculated at 108;

Fox's party at 138; and that of Pitt at 52. Even this unflattering computation is further discounted by the remark that 'of this party, were there a new parliament and Mr. P. no longer to continue minister, not above twenty would be returned.'

As a matter of fact, however, Pitt did not immediately abandon all hope of carrying out his commercial scheme; but the vexed question of the Regency intervened, and though he succeeded in forcing the hands of the Irish administration in respect to the Catholic Relief Bill of 1793, the golden opportunity of establishing a cordial understanding between the two nations on the most durable basis of a community of interest never again recurred.

Passing now over such matters as the impeachment of Warren Hastings, the Regency question and the Oczakow incident, and coming to the subject of the vicerealty of Lord Fitzwilliam, I venture to think that Lord Rosebery has taken the only sound view of this perplexing and much-disputed episode. Notwithstanding his sympathy with Fitzwilliam and the policy he represented, he sees clearly that Fitzwilliam, and Fitzwilliam alone, was the cause of his own recall.

"Fitzwilliam appears to have thought that Ireland was made over to him, as were Lampsacus and Magnesia to Themistocles for his bread and his wine; and that Pitt would have no more to do with its government and the policy pursued there than with Finland or Languedoc. This hallucination was due partly to the idiosyncrasy of Fitzwilliam himself, but mainly to the strange proprietary principles of government, which were held consciously or unconsciously, though quite conscientiously, by the Whig party."

This is the whole matter in a nutshell. From the moment of Fitzwilliam's recall Ireland gradually drifted into rebellion. But Lord Rosebery, while fully recognising the fatal effect of that step in frustrating the hopes of the Irish, hardly attaches sufficient weight to the responsibility which belongs to the Irish Government in the matter. I am all the more anxious to emphasise this point because I believe that it is just here that we must look for the true explanation of Pitt's policy in bringing about the Union. Relieved by Fitzwilliam's recall of all fear of a new system, the Government of Lord Camden and Fitzgibbon passed from one measure of repression to another, the effect of which was simply to goad the more independent spirits to madness. The result was inevitable, but what was Pitt to do? The Fitzwilliam experiment had failed because it threatened to jeopardise the connexion between the two countries; was he therefore to hand over the country again to the tender mercies of a parliament devoid of patriotism and common sense, fit only to register the decrees of Fitzgibbon, and for which the great bulk of the people did not care a brass farthing? Would it not be in the interests of both countries to annihilate it? Lord Rosebery hardly sees the matter in this light. To him it is mainly a question of consolidating the empire and presenting a single front to the enemy, which, of course, is quite true, but hardly, I think, the whole or most essential part of the truth. On the question of Catholic Emancipation he pleads hard for a favourable estimate of Pitt's conduct. He asserts, and asserts truly, that Catholic Emancipation formed no part of the Union scheme; but it is equally certain that promises had been made, and made on Pitt's authority, that the question would get an early and fair hearing in the Imperial parliament. Whether it was that Pitt was faint-hearted in the matter when the Union was carried, and found resignation the easiest way to shelve the question decently, or whether the objections of the King were really insuperable, and that he thought as he said, that his retirement was most likely to contribute to the ultimate success of the measure, is perhaps a moot point; but it must be admitted that Lord Rosebery has established a strong case in favour of the latter view.

In conclusion, no two historians are likely to agree as to Pitt's career in all respects; but we can congratulate Lord Rosebery on having given us a bright and sympathetic and lifelike portrait of the great statesman.

R. DUNLOP.

Darkness and Dawn: or, Scenes in the Days of Nero. By F. W. Farrar. In 2 vols. (Longmans.)

Nor always can the varying activities of an author be brought to converge on a task which concentrates and unifies them. When this is the case, the result is generally happy. Dr. Farrar began his literary career with fiction. His "school tales" manifested that power of graphic description, that vivid intensity of presentation, that imagination at once vigorous and picturesque, that lavish wealth of utterance, which have characterised all his works. Then followed that remarkable series of historical works with which his name is especially connected, commencing with the Life of Christ. This new direction of his literary energies manifested his marvellous power of revivifying and recolouring the uncertain or partially faded events of history, as well as his skill in portraiture. In his present work Dr. Farrar has found a field in which the qualities of a successful fiction writer and a serious historian are happily blended, and in my judgment he has achieved a distinct success. This is the more meritorious, inasmuch as, though the bulk of popular historical knowledge may be said to be derived from novelists and dramatists, a well constructed historical fiction is the rarest product of literature. Either the purely fictitious and imaginary elements are so unduly accentuated as to present the semblance of historical facts, or the latter are so modified and perverted as to be undistinguishable from fiction. Dr. Farrar seems to me to have steered an even course between this Scylla and Charybdis of the historical fiction writer. When we pass from his picturesque chapters to their historical source in the Annals of Tacitus, we are not conscious of an unbridgeable gulf between the historian and his modern adapter. Doubtless he often invests historical personages with the attributes of fiction; but whenever he does so, he is careful to base the transformation or re-creation on some acknowledged probability or psychological fitness. He does not, like some writers, force historical characters to assume a rôle out of all harmony with known antecedents. In this respect his creations—and the remark is true of the masters of historical fiction—have more plausibility and vraisemblance than the real characters of some historians—there is more probability, in the absence of direct evidence, that the Empress Octavia became a Christian convert, than that Henry VIII. was a good husband, or that the Queen of Scots a virtuous lady.

In addition to his second descriptive volume, "Scenes in the Days of Nero," Dr. Farrar calls his book "an historic tale." But, however, the reader must not infer that the book has what a fiction critic would describe as a plot. There is no linked chain of events which necessitates an elucidating solvent, or which grows by natural progression to a catastrophic finale. It may be a moot point whether the concentrated interest of the book might not have been increased by weaving its incidents both of "darkness and dawn" round an imaginary love-story on a plan resembling that which Bar Lytton employed in his Last Days of Pompeii. Dr. Farrar's work comes to an end, and it might be better described, it pauses at the martyrdom of St. Paul and the death of Nero; but there is no reason why, in the course of a history of Pagan Darkness and Christian Dawn, it might not have gone for another half century. The author would hardly contend that the Darkness ceased by that date, or that the Dawn developed into broad daylight. But the age of Nero—and this gives us the secret of the period chosen for the limits of the work—was precisely that portion of early Christian history in which the new light of Christianity was in closest contact with the deepest degradation of Roman Paganism, and which, therefore, afforded special facilities for those sharply demarcated contrasts which Dr. Farrar depicts with such masterly hand. As a result, the work takes the appropriate form of a series of panoramic pictures; or we may regard it as a succession of successive scenes and acts of a largely unstructured and plotless drama.

Of such a work it is obvious that its characteristics must be of a special and peculiar kind. The elements of continuity being various, like the common attributes of a series of sketches of the same country, in which skies and mountains, trees and houses, will necessarily present similar features, we feel compelled to lay stress on the uniformity of parts than on their wholes. We read the book as we pass through a picture-gallery representing a single region or mountain-range, recognising similar landscapes under a perpetual changing, vigorously differentiated, and picturesquely diversified light and shade. But in addition to this general uniformity of subject, design, and execution, there are particular elements of continuity and progressiveness which largely compensate for the want of a dramatic plot. There is the evolution and growth of its characters, whether in the direction tue or of its opposite. Taking Nero one main character of the book, we have a downward progress, indicated by Tacitus brief, abrupt, yet masterly touches, as if an etching needle, elaborated by Dr. Farrar in a series of highly-coloured paintings after the manner of Frith; full of life and vigour, and crowded with appropriate accessories. Here, e.g., is a scene expanded artistically from a few sentences of Tacitus—instinct with movement and vitality, as well as with that imaginative insight which is often more reliable than the evidence of history itself.

After describing an assemblage of the profligate young patricians who formed the court of Nero in the earlier years of his reign, Dr. Farrar proceeds (i. p. 65):—

and yet weariness reigned supreme over these luxurious votaries of fashion. They had first tried to get some amusement out of the games of Massa, a half-witted boy, and Asturco, a dwarf; but when they teased Massa into silliness and Asturco into tears and bellowings of rage, Petronius interfered and voted that amusements boorish and in bad taste. Then they tried to kill time by betting and gambling on games at marbles and draughts. The tables of "leces" of glass, ivory, and silver lay scattered on tables just as they were when the players were tired of the games, and the draught-boards had been carelessly tossed on the floor. Then they sent for plates of honey-apples and bowls of Falernian wine, and took an extemporised meal. Nero even condescended to amuse himself with rolling little ivory chariots down a marble slab and betting on their speed. Still, he felt that the hours were somewhat tedious till a bright thought struck the emperor. He had passed some of his early years in poverty; and this circumstance, together with his aesthetic appreciation of things beautiful, made him delight in showing his treasures to his intimates. By way of finding something to do, he suggested to his friends that they should come and look at the wardrobes of the former Empresses, which were under the charge of a multitude of dressers, tailors, and jewellers. Orders were given that everything should be laid out for their inspection. Except Petronius, they all had an innate passion for jewellery, and they led away an hour in inspecting the robes with gold brocade and broideries of pearl, sapphire, and emerald.

By this time Nero was in high good-humour, and seized the opportunity of a little flattery towards the "lipping hawthorn" of fashion by whom he was surrounded. He chose out a superb cameo on which was carved a Venus Anadyomene and gave it to Poppaea. "There," he said, "that will adorn the neck of your fair Poppaea. Vestinus, this opal is the one for the sake of which Mark Antony secured the proscription of the senator Nonius. It don't deserve it, for you can be very Free speech is a compliment to strong emperors," said Vestinus, hardly concealing the envy of his tone.

"Ah, well," continued Nero, "I shall not give it you for your deserts, but because it will be splendid on the ivory arm of your Statilia. A more fitting present to you would be this viper enclosed in amber—the viper is your emblem, the amber your flattery. And what on earth am I to give you, Senecio? or you, Popponia? You are devoted to so many fairies, that I should have to give you the whole of my robe; but I will give you, Senecio, a fillet embroidered with pearls; and Popponia, Nature has set out this agate—I give it from the spoils of Pyrrhus—for no one but you, for she has marked on it an outline of Apollo and the Muses. Quintianus, this ring with a Hylas on it will just suit you."

"There was a hidden sarcasm in much which he had said even while he distributed his gifts, and not a few serpents hissed among the flowery speeches interchanged in this bad society. But they all thanked him effusively for presents so splendid."

I have no space to continue the passage, which proceeds to relate the well-known incident of the Emperor's present to his mother, Agrippina, and her contemptuous reception of it; but there cannot be two opinions as to the imaginative vigour of the picture, nor yet as to its historical vraisemblance. The scene is one which must have been frequently enacted wholly or in part in the earlier half of Nero's reign. Here again is another picture from a still lower stage of the Imperial "Rake's Progress." Dr. Farrar, we must premise, accepts as true the statement of Suetonius and Dion Cassius, though it is not corroborated by Tacitus, and is received with increasing caution by modern historians, that the burning of Rome was due to Nero's own suggestion:

"At the first news that Rome was in flames, and that they were already approaching his Domus Transitoria, Nero hurried back from Antium. Now, indeed, he had a sensation to his heart's content. At first he was shocked by the magnitude of a catastrophe more overwhelming than had ever before happened to Rome or any other city. He mounted the Tower of Maecenas and gazed for hours upon the scene—thrilling with excitement which was not without its delicious elements. Safe himself, he was looking down on a storm of tempestuous agony, which he could regard in the light of a spectacle. He was accustomed to gaze unmoved on human pangs in the bloody realism of the amphitheatre, and to see slave after slave flung to the lions with their arms bound in chains concealed with flowers. But what scene of the circus, when the gilded chariots were reduced to a crashing wreck of collisions, in which the horses kicked one another and their charioteers to death—what gladiatorial massacre filling the air with the reek of blood—was for a moment comparable to the sight of Rome in flames? The sublime horror of the moment stimulated in him all the genius of melodrama and artificial epic. Surrounded by his parasites, he compared Rome now to a virgin whom the tigers of flame devoured, now to a gladiator wrestling with troops of lions in the arena. He was lost in admiration of the beauty of the fire. Now he called it a splendid rose with petals of crimson, now a diadem of flaming and radiating gold; now, again, an enormous hydra with smoky pinions and tongue of flickering gleam. He wrote many a quaint and fantastic phrase in the note-books which were crowded with his much-lined commonplaces of poetic imagery. Here were the materials for many future poems before him. He could, for instance, write an ode on Tartarus—its horrible spaces of silent anguish, its black vapours, its brazen gates and iron pillars, its ghosts and demons gibbering and shrieking in the shade, its torments and its Pyriphlegethon with cataracts of blood and fire," &c.

Further stages in Nero's downward progress might be quoted had we the requisite space, delineated with a similar wealth of imagery and imaginative power, and all leading inevitably to the tardy but certain Nemesis of the tyrant's final doom. As a set-off to Nero's development we have also the evolution of Onesimus, who occupies no small space on Dr. Farrar's canvas, and whose progress from a crude unformed character with Pagan susceptibilities, to a steadfast, self-centred, and noble Christian is traced with considerable skill. Of the other chief characters in the story, I must select Seneca as exhibiting Dr. Farrar's power of psychological analysis in a pre-eminent degree. Not that even he has been able to reconcile all the incongruities in the great Stoic's character; but he has studied his equivocal position and surroundings with sympathetic interest, and has thus effected something in the way of lessening the incompatibilities of his strange and mournful history.

I have dwelt at some length on the character portraiture of the book, because it constitutes in my opinion one of its chiefest excellencies. Next to this must be enumerated its extraordinary amplitude of erudition. There is no class of Roman society as it then existed, no pursuit or calling, no custom or usage, but is described down to the minutest details. A man who desired a royal road to a knowledge of Rome under Nero might safely be advised to put aside his histories and classical dictionaries and read Dr. Farrar's book. If, as has been alleged, this wealth of classical erudition sometimes manifests itself in a detailed particularity which bears the semblance of ostentation, the real reason is to be found in the author's endeavour to be as instructive as he possibly can; and not even the ripest classical scholar will complain of the Latin equivalents of recondite objects which even though known he might not be able to call to mind on the spur of the moment.

Less need be said of that literary aptitude which more than any other is identified with Dr. Farrar's writings. I mean his power of graphic description. There is hardly a chapter in the two volumes of Darkness and Dawn which does not supply evidence of that remarkable faculty. Here, e.g., is an episode, horrible enough, no doubt, yet eminently characteristic of that brutalisation which formed so conspicuous a feature in the decadence of the Roman Empire. It is taken from one of the most striking chapters in the book (vol. ii., xxxix.) called "The Fight in the Arena."

"After this the other mounted gladiators joined combat. In a very short time nearly all were wounded, and these acknowledged their defeat. Dropping their swords or javelins, they upheld their clenched hands with one finger extended to plead for mercy. The plea was vain. No handkerchief was waved in sign of mercy; and, standing over them, the victors callously drove their swords into the throats of their defeated comrades. The poor conquered fighters did not shrink. They looked up at the shouting populace with something of disdain on their faces, as though to prove that they thought nothing of death and did not wish to be pitied. To see that none were shamming dead, a figure entered disguised as Charon, who smote them with his hammer; but the work of the sword had been done too faithfully—he smote only the corpses of the slain."

Here again is another forcible description in quite another mode, taken from the eloquent chapter that describes the burning of Rome. The rush and surge of the devouring element seems reproduced in the glowing, impetuous sentences.

"Nero set out for Antium on July 17. Two days afterwards Rome was in a sea of surging flame. Men noticed that it was the anniversary of the day on which four and a half centuries earlier the city had been burnt by the Gauls. The fire had burst forth in the neighbourhood of the Circus Maximus. The shops and store-houses which surrounded that huge structure were full of combustible materials, including the machinery and properties used in the public spectacles. Here the flames seized a secure hold, and raging about the Coelian, rolled towards the eastern part of the Palatine. Checked by the steep sides of the hill and its Cyclopean architecture, the fire swept down the valleys on either side, to the right along the Via Nova; to the left along the Triumphal Way. It ravaged the Velabrum and the Forum. It consumed the temple and altar reared to Hercules by the Arcadian Evander, the palace of Numa, and the circular temple of Vesta which enshrined the ever-burning hearth and Penates of the Roman people. Sweeping into the Carinae, which was crowded by consular palaces, it drowned those stately structures and the many trophies of ancient victories with which they were enriched. On the Aventine it destroyed the temple which Servius Tullius had erected to the Moon, and in it the priceless relics of Greek art which L. Mummius had brought from Corinth. Rolling back to the Palatine with more victorious violence, it reduced to a blackened ruin the venerable temple which Romulus had vowed to Jupiter Stator. Then licking up everything which lay in its path, it rioted with voluptuous fury in the more densely crowded regions of the city, raging and crackling among the old tortuous purlieus and crazy habitations of the Subura. With its hot breath it purged the slums and rookeries, foul with a pauper population of oriental immigrants, who were massed round the ill-famed shrines of Isis and Serapis. When it had acquired irresistible volume in these lower regions it again rushed up the hills as with the rage of a demon, to sweep down once more in tumultuous billows over the hapless levels. For six days and seven nights it maintained its horrible and splendid triumph—now bounding from street to street with prodigious rapidity; now seeming to linger luxuriously in some crowded district, flinging up to heaven great sheets of flame, and turning the nightly sky into a vault of suffocating crimson."

In a picture occupying such an enormous canvas and containing such a number and variety of incidents and figures, nothing would be easier than to find faults, whether in the design or the execution. It has been objected—e.g., that Dr. Farrar's "Darkness" is too unrelievedly black and lurid, and that his "Dawn" is much too bright and promising for historical accuracy. To this it may be answered that the first half of the objection can only proceed from those who are ignorant of the sources whence Dr. Farrar has drawn his descriptions. The reader of Tacitus, Dion Cassius, and Suetonius is perfectly aware that the actual darkness was in reality much blacker and denser than Dr. Farrar has dared to depict it, and that he has evinced no little skill in moderating or suppressing the worst features of Roman manners in the days of Nero; and if he has exaggerated the amount of brightness in the nascent Christianity of the same period, he has been probably actuated by an artistic sense of equiposing the antagonistic forces. But, secondly, there is a further reply. An artist must surely be allowed some margin in the execution of work for which he is aware of his especial aptitude. It would be both futile and puerile to blame some acknowledged master of chiaroscuro, such as Rembrandt, that his contrasts of light and shadow are too decisive and striking, when they were both true to nature and were adapted for rare artistic effect. Granted that the circumstances which created the juxtaposition might be exceptional, that is no reason why the artist should not avail himself of such rare opportunities. Indeed, it is one mark of the artistic instinct that it recognises at a glance and eagerly avails itself of every opportunity of seizing on the picturesque wherever it discerns it. How many Church historians have written of the days of Nero without noting the artistic effect producible by bringing the degradation of Rome into approximation with the new Light of Christianity. How well Dr. Farrar has achieved this—the main purpose of his work—I must leave my readers to ascertain by its perusal.

More formidable would be any objections based on the inaccurate character of the book. That which I regard as most noteworthy is that Dr. Farrar has exaggerated the need of secrecy among the Christians of Nero's court. At least Merivale in his History does not scruple to say "of the perfect security with which the Gospel of the true Christ was professed at this time in Rome there can be no question." It seems probable that it was their confusion with the Jews that caused the popular aversion to them remarked by Tacitus and Suetonius, though, of course, the position of the Christians, like that of other professors of "foreign superstitions," must have varied in different periods of Nero's reign.

But my limits have already been exceeded; and I must end by avowing my conviction that Darkness and Dawn is an important addition, not to contemporary fiction, as some critics have unworthily placed it, but to the picturesque and graphic treatment of ecclesiastical history. Nowhere else can the student, tired of the dry bones of Mosheim and his successors, find the records of late Roman and early Christian history lit up with such a warm glow of imagination and realistic power as in this book. It is impossible that any reader should peruse it without having his feeling wholesomely stimulated and his intellect copiously informed and illuminated.

Pococke's Tour in Ireland in 1752. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by George T. Stokes, D.D. (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis & Co.)

"MONDAY, June 22, 1752, I went to Swords, dined there with the Chapter of Christ Church. Set out at five northwards, found the country extremely pleasant." This is the unpretentious manner in which Dr. Pococke, then Archdeacon of Dublin, afterwards Bishop successively of Ossory and of Meath, begins his account of a tour on horseback, which extended round the whole seaboard of Ireland, and in which difficulties and hardships not a few had to be encountered. Pococke, however, was a traveller not easily daunted. He had explored Syria, Asia Minor, and Egypt; he was one of the first of Englishmen to discover the interest and beauty of Switzerland. He had learning, observant curiosity, and indefatigable energy; and the records of his tours are still well worth reading.

The present volume is a transcript from a hitherto unpublished MS. in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, which had been brought to notice by Prof. Stokes in the columns of the Dublin Daily Freeman. A public-spirited citizen of Dublin offered to bear the expenses of publication, and Dr. Stokes contributes an interesting preface and a few notes. It was unquestionably a public service to print such a record of this. Irish historians, genealogists and antiquaries will have to make themselves acquainted with it. At the same time it may be said that this itinerary will not interest a general reader unless he happens to be acquainted with places visited by Pococke, and wishes to see what an intelligent observer found to notice in them a century and a half ago. Pococke's journal consists of notes, out of which a narrative of general interest might have been constructed. In it stands, it is not to be compared, for example, with Arthur Young's Tour in Ireland, in point of vivacity, descriptive power, or instructiveness. He noted down all that he observed of the geology of the districts visited, of the industries flourishing there, of the architecture and antiquities of something of the scenery; rarely anything of the social or moral condition of the people, and absolutely nothing of the politics of the country. He gives us a Quid but little of the Quale, and still less of the Quomodo; and any general view which would give real significance to his individual observations must be gained from other sources. Still, among these compendious entries things of striking interest are occasionally met with. The scene, for instance, which he witnessed at Donegal:

"Going from church in the morning I observed a circumstance, which added to the Roman view of the mountains to the south. In the side of one of them a sort of Amphitheatre formed in the rock; here I saw several hundred people spread all over that plain spot and a priest celebrating Mass under the rock, at an altar made of loose stones, and tho' it was half a mile distant, I observed his Pontifical vestment with a black cross on it; from this country for sixty miles west and south far as Connaught, they celebrate in the air, in the fields or on the mountains. Papists being so few and poor, that they cannot be at the expence of a public building.

It does not appear that these open-air celebrations were, as has been often presented, necessitated by the operation of the penal laws. Here is another interesting passage, giving us a glimpse into the interior of a Connaught cabin:

"We here got into a Cabin where they had clean straw and clean blankets;—but tho' observing the smooak was very troublesome.

he made me a low seat near the fire, and I did it was not so inconvenient, the smok- ing up and condensing above. The guide ed for an egg, broke off the top and emptied into a scollop shell, as I thought to dress it, the poor here use scollop shells for all uses can, as they do on the Red sea, but I was orized when I saw him give a dram about in egg-shell; the woman also melted tallow scollop and dipt the rushes in it. . . . common people of the country live too h on these poor wretches when they travel, om bringing anything with them a [survival ighn and livery!], and they were surprized n I distributed my bread and meat and at I had among them, and that I gave them ee of money when I went away."

The food of these people, we learn, con- ed of oatcakes, potatoes, and buttermilk menu which certainly compares favour- y with "potatoes and point." The oat- es have disappeared now, and so, very gely, has the buttermilk; not, however, e hospitality and helpfulness which ocke seems to have met with everywhere from every class in Ireland.

The editing of this volume has not been rformed in a manner altogether satis- ory. It has no index and no map, and names of places are often absurdly guised. Dr. Stokes rightly determined ve what Pococke wrote without correc- ; but more pains should have been en to ascertain what he did write. No bt he was often puzzled by the pronun- ion of the natives; but when we come n names like "Beleseclair," "Daren," "ilcollogan," "Moyeulau," "Kildaimon," find that they are identifiable, respect- ly, with Ballysodare, Claren, Kilcolgan, ycullen, Kilclonan, it becomes obvious t the transcriber's eye, not Pococke's , is mainly at fault. It is easy to con- e cl with d and n with u, &c.; but there is excuse for doing so repeatedly, when a nce at the map would have shown what l intended. What would be thought and l about an edition of a Latin MS. in ch, let us say, "Damocles" consistently eared as "Clamodes"?

Bogatzky's Golden Treasury: a Reprint of Mr. John Thornton's Edition of 1775, with Critical Notes hitherto Unpub- lished by John Berridge. Edited by Charles P. Phinn. With Introduction by H. C. G. Moule. (Elliot Stock.)

As is an interesting edition of a not very interesting work. The book is a reprint of an interleaved copy of the 1775 edition of the translation, or paraphrase, of Bogatzky's Golden Treasury, which was sent to J. Thornton to John Berridge of Ever- for his corrections and preparation for the press. It has been further revised by the Rev. W. Bull. When thus sent to Berridge, though professing to be Bogatzky's Golden Treasury, only two-thirds of the work was in any sense Bogatzky's, and only thirty-seven hymns out of the 366; the rest were all borrowed or adapted from English authors, or written expressly for the work by Mr. Thornton and his friends; the verse was mostly taken from Dr. Watts. In addition to this, Berridge, without consultation or knowledge of the original, frequently re-wrote whole paragraphs, and sometimes entire papers; very few indeed are left wholly untouched, and Bogatzky, could he have read English, would have been sorely puzzled to recognise in this dress his "Güldenes Schätz-kästlein."

But this edition has a value altogether apart from this. (1.) It presents us with an exact reproduction of the opinions of the chief of the Evangelical Fathers in the Church of England who were neither Wesleyans nor ultra-Calvinists; we see them here in all the excellence of their earnest piety, their missionary zeal, their strong common sense, their democratic equality where religion was concerned, but also in their narrowness and in their limitations. (2.) We scarcely know where to find a more useful lesson for a young writer, whether in prose or verse, especially if he be at all given to fine writing, than a careful study of these pungent remarks by John Berridge. It was not in religion only that he was a staunch Puritan; he was equally a puritan in English. He strove as vigorously to keep his English undefiled as he did to keep his Gospel pure. He has no mercy on the use of a word of Latin origin when an English one will suffice.

"N.B.—The word elucidate implies and wholly eats up the word explain; then why is it added? Whatever adds no strength to a sentence, encumbers and weakens it.

"Is not permanent, durable? And is not fluctuating, changeable? Then I will translate the sentence into English, and you will see what figure it makes . . . 'to distinguish between what is durable and durable, and what is changeable and changeable.'

"I wonder sensible authors do not study to write plainly, since plain words have more force, yea, and more elegance, than hard ones.

"Most authors are enamoured with Latin words, as if they were better than good English.

"An English author, who cannot write English, deserves the stocks.

"N.B.—Is not an English word better for an English reader than a Latin one? Yet how few authors know how to write English! Indeed, it requires more care and pains than most people are aware of. The Bible and Bailey's Dictionary are my chief books, one to teach me the Gospel, and the other to teach me English.

"This Paper is chiefly Latin, and calls aloud for Bailey's Dictionary.

"As and as, when near together, bray like an ass.

"I do not love, &c., in writing; it is a lazy author-trick."

These are but samples of scores of like notes. Nor is Berridge a whit less caustic in his remarks on the verse, which he corrects as freely as he does the prose, and some- times very happily.

"N.B.—Notwithstanding the various Houses of Confinement, we still want one in this kingdom, a poetical madhouse for the cure of rhyming lunatics.

"N.B.—The last lines of the third verse want two essential things, viz., rhyme and meaning.

"The fourth line of the first stanza is not verse, but mere prose.

"N.B.—All, and infinitely more than all, is infinite nonsense. N.B.—Mr. C. Wesley, in his poetry, often soars above all hyperbolics."

As we see by this last example, Mr. Berridge has no respect for persons. He attacks the most popular writers and poets of the day as freely as he does less known authors. He has a vigorous onslaught on Jonathan Edwards, Howe finds no favour, Bogatzky often falls under the lash. "I cannot relish Bogatzky's ranting." "The author was nodding over his pipe when he composed this paper." "This paper was wrote by moonlight; I do not well understand it."

Nor is Berridge's criticism wholly nega- tive. He was unacquainted with the original; yet when the translator makes all but nonsense of it, Berridge's instinct not unfrequently enabled him to correct his errors and to bring the translation into accordance with the unseen text. Occasion- ally he blunders, as when he falls foul of one of the few really pretty papers; where- upon Rev. Wm. Bull has well written over his remarks: Murder! Murder! or as when he sneers at Thomas Aquinas. Yet, on the whole, strange as it may seem to be sent to such a book for such a purpose, a young writer could hardly do better than spend a few hours in turning over these notes and carefully considering these corrections by sturdy John Berridge.

Unto Death. By Fleur de Lys. (A. W. Hall.)

Conscience. By Hector Malot. Translated by J. E. S. Rae. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

THE question which must have been put to themselves by all critical persons, when they took up Mrs. Woods's bold venture into the most dangerous kind of historical novel, must have been: Would she or would she not justify her going about to break that law of the kind which is partly, though not wholly, written in a famous canon of Joubert's? The law is that, when the novelist attempts an historical subject, he shall make his interest centre upon purely fictitious persons, bringing in the real ones as—at any rate, in appearance—accessories. This law, like most such laws, is partly inductive and partly deductive. It is an observed fact that the great writers of such novels have almost always—and always without the almost in their most successful work—obeyed the law, and that, to all appearance, instinctively. And it is a principle easily perceivable a priori that, if this is not done, either liberty must be taken with the historical facts, or at least there must be the danger of jarring the reader's preconceived ideas about the characters. Now Mrs. Woods has, at first sight, flown straight in the face of this law. She has, indeed, a fictitious underplot of considerable ambition, but her hero throughout is none other than Swift; her heroines throughout none other than Vanessa and Stella themselves. We shall not undertake to decide here the point which the counsel for Mrs. Woods suggests, that the actual story is so legendary and ill ascertained in its most important facts, that it really gives a great deal of liberty. We shall not even dwell on the other point, that Mrs. Woods has considerably altered the historical or legendary denouement, by changing the fatal letter of Vanessa to Stella into an actual interview between the two women. It is enough that she has done the thing with a remarkable and unexpected amount of success. If we were of those peddlers who call whatsoever they disagree with a fault, we could hit some blots. Mrs. Woods justifies Mr. Thackeray when he said that women generally take Vanessa's part; and we think she is a little (though she does not mean to be) unfair to Stella. Her view of Swift's attitude to Irish politics is pretty certainly mistaken. She may take it from us that this attitude was as purely frondeur and as little Nationalist as could be. We grieve to see that she does not like his delightful puns and nonsense verses, and actually compares them (we have turned the prayer machine many times that she may be forgiven) to the stuff of modern burlesque writers. But these things are nothing at all. She has given us a Vanessa both passionate and possible; a Swift who is most human and therefore most Swiftian; and a Stella who is also possible, though she is not our Stella. The opening scene of the second volume is as strong a thing as we have read for some years in English; the lighter parts of the first volume are fresh and good; the gloom of the end is not ill-rendered; and the pains which the author has taken to saturate herself with the language and atmosphere of the Journal are seldom lost labour. The weakest part of the book undoubtedly is the underplot, which Mrs. Woods, perhaps in unconscious terror of the law, has endeavoured to make unusually striking and prominent. Francis Earle, Swift's rival, is uninteresting enough to have been the hero, but that is all. The wicked Lord Mordaunt, Peterborough's son, is no better, and much worse. Ginckel Vanhomrigh, the brother, is of that dangerous kind of fool-knave who requires very skilful handling. Molly indeed, Esther's sister, the heroine-victim of this part, is very well; but she abides, a ghost with no interest left in her, too long on the scene. All this is no doubt a drawback to the book, but it remains the best attempt to do a probably impossible thing that we remember to have seen.

Miss Mabel Robinson is too clever a young lady not to have inserted, with a point of malice, a phrase early in her book wherein the author of La Terre is classed with Dante, Shakspeare, Molière, and a few others, as examples of the first-class in literature. But the point of malice slips off the shield of serenity: and for our parts we shall give her leave to "eke and add" with M. Ohnet himself if she likes. A certain effort is indeed perceptible to introduce Naturalist treatment, and it does not improve the book; but its weakest feature is, oddly enough, one which M. Zola could have taught his disciple to avoid. If titles were taken from real centres of interest, the book would have been named "Althea Rodriguez." Althea is not exactly a divine Althea: she is even excessively human. Half Jewess and half Englishwoman by blood, she keeps the mixture pretty constantly at boiling point, but rapidly changes the chafing dishes. She becomes violently enamoured of the thews, the glory, the name, and the expectations of Hovenden, V.C., an honourable and gallant chuckle-head. He becoming a cripple by accident, and losing his expectations by the birth of a nearer heir, she transfers her passion to Dallas Sugden, a brawny boor of a surgeon. When Sugden has dragged her to almost the lowest depths of Bohemia, she reverts lefthandedly to Hovenden, and then most conveniently dies—a sort of Copperfield-and-Agnes after-piece rewarding the chuckle-headed hero. He has had odd experiences of other kinds, which we tell not that the story may be saved. Now this death of Althea is too convenient. The real Althea, we can tell Miss Robinson in confidence, did not die. She left Hovenden for Number Three, and Number Three for Number Four; and at length became, or will become, if she has not committed suicide directly or indirectly, one of those

"Sur qui pèse la griffe effroyable de Dieu."

The Frenchman, to do him justice (which we always do), would have shown us this. Miss Robinson, whom we do not like any the less for it, has been afraid to do so; and so death and Agnes crown the rose-pink scene. The whole of the first volume is very clever; and though we do not think Sugden is consistently drawn, Althea's final breach with him is well done. But grime and rose-pink abide not well together.

Mr. Percy Fendall's novel is a very fair specimen of the "queer story," amplified into two volumes. Two men, both officers in the army and in want of money, have combined to cheat at cards, and undetected win a large sum of money, which they divide. Some time afterwards, one of them, Colonel Lyle, comes into a fortune, and the other, Captain Blackford, persistently blackmails him. The victim's eldest daughter accidentally discovers the facts and breaks off a promising match, feeling that she has no right to marry with this disgrace hanging over her. Add to these characters a younger sister of this heroine, an adventuress of the name of Mrs. Dalrymple, and Lord Glenmurray, Kate Lyle's suitor, and the "effective" of The Gambler's Secret is summed up. The whole thing is, of course, slight, and there are one or two blots in it. The reforming passion, for instance, of the rascal Blackford for the bread-and-butter Rose Lyle, though not impossible, is so improbable as to be out of keeping with an otherwise very matter-of-fact story. And if Mrs. Dalrymple was half as clever and half as worldly-woman as she is represented, she hardly have devised a will for Colonel which was practically certain to be for "undue influence." But it respects the story shows narrative constructive faculty, which are rather on the subject and the style.

The merits as also the defects of the of "Charles Egbert Cradock" are at time pretty well known. It is a small thing to have so completely and rendered the physiognomy of people in a particular district. On the other hand, the combination of the dialect in conversation with the finest newest fashions in description and is, to some tastes, more incongruous pleasing. Whether the good or the bad dominates in this book need not be said; the story is simple. One Shattuck, a man, goes to explore certain ancient graveyards, to the no small suspicion of the countryside. The misdeeds of a gang of horse-stealers bring about divers troubles and at last quite a little Armageddon shooting at sight. The "leete peas" as the country folk call their pease-neighbours, also have no small influence on the domestic happiness of a certain Yates and the fortunes of one, Letitia Penn, the blueness of whose eyes is perpetually spurring on the writer to new details (as Mr. J. R. Green observed several years ago) of the poet Dryden's indulgence in word-painting. The book shows great willfully hampered, not by the dialect but by the provincial affectations of the writing.

With respect to the two next books on our list, the generous mind hesitates to breathe the name of Mr. Rider Haggard. Of course men had had documentary material to puzzle out before the earlier chapters of King Solomon's Mines, and had been up in rocky dungeons before the later ones. Still, when we find one of the incidents in The Fossicker and the other in The Brethren of Atlas, not to mention more coincidences in each, it seems a little to smack. But no matter for that. Fossicker is a fairly sensational story of South Africa, and the other a fairly tedious story of North Africa. The latter (which, by the way, is only a first part) is the more ambitious and the better, though it is marred by an attempt at a by-play; The Fossicker is the livelier, most "accidental." We have no better say of either.

Unto Death is an instance, and not a one, of what a German critic would probably define as the religious-romantic bourgeois style. This style has been rather American than English, and a great exemplar was the Rev. E. P. Roe, over whom Englishmen have made fun quite according to knowledge: for Roe was a remarkable man in his way, a sort of male Mrs. Henry Wood in fact though not in style. "In the school of P. Roe 'Fleur de Lys' is a scholar and a fairly proficient one.

M. Hector Malot's clean and craftsman-like, if not very exalted or artistic, was own to all readers of French novels. Miss Rae has selected a very fair specimen that work, and has translated it better in fairly.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

GIFT BOOKS.

Cloud of Witness. A Daily Sequence of Great Thoughts from Many Minds, following the Christian Seasons. By the Hon. Mrs. Stretton Gell. (Henry Frowde.)

It is the object of this little book to detach and emphasise some cardinal point of Christian teaching (always the thought most plainly obvious) associated with each Sunday and Holy-day; and to send it in its different aspects for daily meditation throughout the week, illuminated and enforced by cogent testimony drawn from the minds of those who, from age to age, have seemed to catch the truly the Heavenly Vision—to hear most clearly the Divine Voices—to apprehend in fullest measure the realities of God's Purpose amongst men.

This ambitious design has been carried out by the compiler, not only with much taste, but with the utmost catholicity. If she has given a large share of space to the great teachers of the present century, both in verse and prose, she has not disdained to include the purest of pagan philosophers, or even the Koran. Such a "golden treasury" should be accessible, we may be pardoned for remarking, in the list of authors, Bacon is given a place in the peerage which he never possessed. The mechanical execution of this volume, it is impossible to speak too highly. Printed at Oxford Press, on India paper, with red initials, borders, and ornaments, and with a phototype reproduction of Mr. Holman Hunt's "Light of the World" for frontispiece, it forms a thing of pleasure for the eye to look upon and the fingers to touch; while it never fails to bring to mind at some familiar passage that awakes sweet memories.

Stories from the Bible. Second Series. By Rev. A. T. Church. (Macmillans.) We have enjoyed this second series of Stories from the Bible more than the first. The reason is probably not because they are better written, because we have had time to get over the shock of the transformation of the familiar narrative. We have become more aware of the sense and judgment exercised by Mr. Church in compiling his book, and more sensible of the simplicity and dignity of his own style. The fulness of his labours to teachers or preachers who are trying to instruct others in the history of the Israelites can scarcely be over-estimated. The illustrations "after Julius Schnorr" are continued.

Lady Hymn Writers. By Mrs. E. R. Pitman. (London.) Industry and enthusiasm have combined to make Mrs. Pitman's compilation successful. We do not always agree with her selection of examples, and her information is frequently scrappy; but her genuine interest in her subject is apparent in every chapter, and makes her book readable. No attempt is made to criticise popular tastes. If a hymn is popular, the author's name is mentioned with as much information about her as it occurs to Mrs. Pitman to give; and some further specimen of her powers is added, not so well known as the hymn which has occasioned comment. The feebleness of these specimens is a considerable tribute to the soundness of popular opinion. Mrs. Pitman generally quotes with some authority when she ventures to criticise, and not always wisely. Would she have found that "Nearer my God to Thee" reveals the lack of the Saviour" if she had been aware that the author was a Unitarian? We should like to see this passage struck out. In the chapter on "hymn writers who were also poetesses," it is not the best poets who receive the most attention. But Mrs. Pitman's book inevitably lays itself open to criticism in detail. The essential fact about it is that as a whole it is a success.

Short Tales for Lads of a Bible-class. First Series. Second Series. Tales for a Bible-class of Girls. By the Rev. W. E. Heygate. (S.P.C.K.) Mr. Heygate's short tales are of unusual merit. His vigorous directness is perhaps most successful in the volumes intended for lads, but it will not displease girls, and makes all his tales readable. He is aware that improving stories, if young people are to read them, must be real stories, and that the moral must be kept in proper subordination. He can write a crisp lively piece of dialogue when necessary; and without pretending to delineate character with any elaboration, he yet contrives to give tolerable distinctness to many of his heroes and heroines. His books cannot fail to be useful to those for whom they are written.

Baxter's Second Innings. Specially reported for the School Eleven. (Hodder & Stoughton.) Even if it were not for the open secret of its authorship, this booklet would deserve notice for the novelty of its external form and the boldness of its conception. The author of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, having reduced the doctrines of evolution to a moral allegory, now ventures to treat the game of cricket according to the same method. It is not difficult to guess which of the players takes the part of the demon; but the interest is rather taken out of the game when we are told that the captain never lost a match. However, the pill is sweetened by quotations from no less an authority than Dr. W. G. Grace, though we are not sure that all the teaching is such as he would approve. As a means of instruction, we had thought the allegory long ago extinct—the last that we remember to have read was called Agathos. But Prof. James Drummond has almost persuaded us that any genre in literature is capable of being brought to life again by earnestness and simplicity.

Gods and Heroes; or, The Kingdom of Jupiter. By R. E. Francillon. With eight Illustrations (Blackwood.) Mr. Francillon, whose reputation has been won in other walks of fiction, here essays a task that at the present time is well nigh impossible. Now that the surviving copies of dear old Lempriere must be thumbed out of legibility, and Ovid is unread even by boys, we fear it is too late a day to touch the beautiful mythology of Greece. Not that Mr. Francillon has dimmed its brightness. Indeed, we think that his bright, easy, conversational style (though certainly not Hellenic, much less Roman) gives him some advantage over the weird languors of Nathaniel Hawthorne, or the conscientious vigour of Charles Kingsley. We are pleased with what we have read, and we undertake to say that the book will bear well reading aloud. We only hope we are wrong in thinking that the subject-matter has largely lost its savour for the young generation, whose palates have been stimulated by more spicy dishes, and who openly show their opinions about "compulsory Greek." Assuredly, Mr. Francillon has not been helped by his illustrator: the frontispiece is worthy of "La Belle Hélène." It remains true that no English artist but Flaxman has ever gone near to imitating "the glory that was Greece."

Stories for Boys. By Richard Harding Davis. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.) We have not read the "short stories" which won for Mr. Davis the name of an American Rudyard Kipling. But it happens that the first tale in the present volume deliberately challenges such a comparison, both in title and in subject. As he has brought it on his own head, he must submit to be told that talent is a very different thing from genius. He can write with crispness, and he has already mastered the difficulties of dialogue, which so many English authors seem to find insuperable. But he lacks that supreme imaginative faculty which compels even the dullest reader to realise what is presented to him on the printed page. He never carries us away with him; he never leaves an impression that we cannot forget. For the rest, we gladly admit that he is clever and readable, and has here given us a fresh conception of the American boy, who appears to be even more devoted to athletic hero-worship than his English cousin. We are sorry, however, to learn that the "turf" in the United States seems to be in the same condition as—let us say—in Austria; that the umpires at lawn-tennis matches can only be restrained from unfair decisions by the presence of herculean chuckers-out; and that it is high praise to say of a 'varsity football player: "You never hit a man on the field unless he's playing foul or trying to hurt some of your team."

The Story of a Puppet; or, the Adventures of Pinocchio. By C. Collodi. Translated from the Italian by M. A. Murray. Illustrated by C. Mazzanti. (Fisher Unwin.) Pinocchio, my dear Pinocchio, though you were only made of wood, I feel sure that that wood was of no common sort—not deal, nor elm, nor even poplar. Nor was the tree a common one of its kind, whatever that kind were. It was a tree sprung from some ancestor famous in fable—that of Myrrha, perchance or Daphne, or one at least of which the roots had been fed with human tears, or the sap with human blood. No wonder your maker, Guspetto, loved you; no wonder the sweet fairy with the blue hair adopted you as her son, for you were no ordinary puppet. I have known boys more heartless, grown-up men more vicious. Did you not always preserve a love for Guspetto though he gave you such an awkward nose? Were you not ready to be burnt rather than Harlequin should suffer in your stead? You make me wish that I had been a puppet, too. Then perhaps I might have seen the white child in the wood and the showman Fire-eater; might have slept at the Sign of the Crawfish, and been swallowed by that great monster of the sea who took a whole ship at a gulp. Such experiences were not, indeed, without their terror, and they were ill-turns which were done to you by the cat and the fox and the little man who drove the coach to the Land of Boobies; but they were experiences—grand experiences. I wish I had known you like Signor Collodi, I wish I had seen you like Signor Mazzanti; as it is, I can only thank them for introducing you to my imagination. Perhaps as you are now a little boy I shall meet you some day—till when, farewell.

The Little Marine and the Japanese Lily. By Florence Marryat. (Hutchinson.) The Little Marine is Charlie Harrison, and the Japanese Lily a Japanese infant, who was found derelict after the battle of Simono-seki, when Prince Choosin was defeated. Charlie is a bugler of twelve years old and does all sorts of brave things. He saves the life of an officer, and nearly kills a little Japanese boy who had tortured his pet fawn. But he loses his temper on this occasion, and goes on hitting the little Japanese boy long after he ought to have left off. Such conduct in such a moral story as this could not be allowed to pass without punishment for the edification of other little boys. So poor little Lily is stolen by the Japanese boy, to the great grief of the whole regiment, and especially of Charlie, who was devoted to her; and when she is found again, she is in a dreadful state of neglect and dirt. But this is not the worst, for she has the small-pox, of which she dies, ing "Dentle Desus," which Charlie has light her. Altogether, the book is about the best performance we have read for some time.

The Tenants of Johnson's Court, and Other Stories. By Janet Armytage. (Partridge.) Pathetic interest attaches to this book, for the author, Miss Katharine Axon, who wrote under the name of Janet Armytage, died in October, 1890, while she was engaged in preparing it for the press. Although only seventeen years of age, Miss Axon had already made herself known in and beyond her native city of Manchester as a writer, and still more a strenuous worker for the amelioration of the condition of the poor. From these stories it is evident that, if she had lived to develop fully her literary powers, she would have made a name for herself. But to say that the book is full of promise would be less than the truth, for here is not promise alone but actual achievement—a maturity of power greater than we are entitled to expect. Miss Axon has told her stories of humble life with the directness and simplicity of a skilled story-teller. Mrs. Gaskell herself, the great writer of the novels of the Lancashire poor, could hardly have told some of them better. In a pathetic sketch of Miss Axon's life, contributed by Miss Beatrice Lindsay, it is stated that Miss Axon was an admirer of Mrs. Gaskell's works, and of some of the novels of Charlotte Brontë. This we can easily believe; for there is no echo of Mrs. Gaskell or of anyone else in her own stories. In the course of her philanthropic ministrations, Miss Axon witnessed the occurrences which she has reproduced with such a life-like touch. Her pathos is good; her descriptions of town and country scenes are very good. Perhaps her power is greater in bringing little, simple incidents vividly before the imagination—Natalie's journey through the snow, the death of Jack Danley, a description of the old apple woman exhibit her dramatic power. Miss Axon made literature subservient to her philanthropic purpose, but in doing so happily did not spoil her art. Each story, apart from its "moral" setting, is complete—a little gem of its kind. And it is distinct evidence of talent that, although all the pieces in the volume are intended to teach one and the same lesson—the evil of the drink traffic—there is no sameness or repetition in either incident or manner of treatment. In expressing hope that Miss Axon's other writings may be collected and published, we venture to suggest that they would be worthy of a somewhat better "get up" than has been provided in the present stories. The "Onward Series," of which the volume belongs, includes some useful books, but hitherto it has not been distinguished by the artistic character of its writing.

Voices by the Way. By the Rev. Harry Jones. (P. C. K.). Mr. Harry Jones collects in this volume a number of short essays on miscellaneous subjects, having nothing in common but the object of edifying the mind and temper of readers without taxing too much their powers of attention. The papers are clearly intended to amuse as well as to instruct. The book exhibits the characteristics with which readers of Mr. Harry Jones's previous volumes are familiar. It is never to any remarkable extent profound, imaginative or subtle: one is, indeed, occasionally tempted to complain that he is commonplace; but as a rule he writes with admirable good sense and good nature, and displays a large acquaintance with men, combined with keen and appreciative a knowledge of books and science as can be shown by one not professing to be a student. To read one of these essays is to chat for ten minutes with the author; and Mr. Harry Jones is emphatically a man whom it does us good to talk to, whose conversation and character brace and encourage us. The style of the papers is vigorous and direct. Mr. Jones can always explain himself in clear pithy English, easily understood but yet thoroughly impressive.

Sweet William; or, The Castle of Mount St. Michael. By Marguerite Bonvel. (Nelson.) The author succeeds in importing into her book some breath of the time and place with which she deals. She tells very gracefully the story of a young child's influence for good upon a man of stern and unforgiving temperament. The power of character when it is consistent is convincingly insisted upon. We can heartily recommend the tale, which is pleasantly illustrated and bound.

Bab; or, the Triumph of Unselfishness. By Ismay Thorn. (Blackie.) We cannot admire the outside of Bab; the inside has certain very obvious merits. The story is well conceived, and told with simplicity and directness. Some of the domestic scenes are of more than average merit. The fault of the tale is an over-anxiety to inculcate a moral. Bab is not always as childlike as she ought to be, and her fondness for "heaping coals of fire" on other people's heads would cause great irritation in most family circles. The illustrations are much better than the design on the binding led us to expect.

The Precious Things of Home. By the Rev. Walter Senior. ("Home Words" Office.) This handful of essays, reprinted from Home Words, well deserves a wider circulation. They are terse and telling addresses to young wives and mothers, admirably suited for parochial use and sure to be popular if read at mothers' meetings and the like. Middle-class homes would be a great deal happier than they are were the teachings of these essays more generally practised.

How to Keep Healthy. By Alfred T. Schofield, M.D. (Religious Tract Society.) This volume contains a series of papers on health and cognate topics which have appeared at intervals in the pages of the Leisure Hour. They are written in an easy style, and are likely to prove useful to others besides the unfortunate School Board teacher, who has to give instruction in hygiene. Some of Dr. Schofield's statements are a little too unqualified. "No child can eat too much wholesome food" is a doctrine which must not be preached indiscriminately at Christmastide; and what will early-risers make of the dictum, "It is better never to begin work before seven a.m.?" The chapter on "How to make the most of a holiday" is sensible; and, indeed, the same epithet may be applied to most of the book.

Ten Minutes Tales for every Sunday. By Frances Harriet Wood. (S.P.C.K.) There seems no reason why these tales should be arranged under successive Sundays, as, with one or two exceptions, they are in no way connected with the teaching for their Sundays as set forth in the Prayer-book. But the stories are generally interesting. Those dealing with historical subjects are most successful, but we have noticed none which can be called altogether a failure. The author writes well and takes pains. Illustrations and binding are equally pleasant.

Fleming of Brierwood. By Hester White. (S.P.C.K.) With a much more interesting love-story than is common in the books of this venerable society, the characters of Fleming, Simon and Miss Drake, are carefully drawn from the first page to the last. The few touches which describe country scenery are also effective. This authoress exhibits considerable promise, and her future work will be expected with eagerness.

Brief Counsels Concerning Business. By an Old Man of Business. (Religious Tract Society.)

This well meaning but verbose book treats business from its moral and religious side. In directness of aim and diction it often misses its mark. For instance, a long chapter on "Partners" may be summarised in the statement: "If you have partners, be prepared to give and take." So when Ruskin is named, he is described as "the great writer on the man's subjects he has enriched and adorned with the products of his pen, and of whose value to our country in raising the morale of its people we as a nation can have a just conception when," &c., &c. The author of these Counsels is doubtless earnest and upright, but his vocabulary is not literature.

Talks to Girls by One of Themselves on the Difficulties, Duties, and Joys of a Girl's Life. (S.P.C.K.) As a present to girls going out to service, or for use at meetings of the Girl-Friendly Society, these twenty papers would be admirable. They are written in a sympathetic spirit with much common sense. With their excellent counsels more generally inculcated, girls would be both better and happier. Unreserved praise may be awarded to this little book.

Parson's Green, by G. Norway (Nelson) portrays the different lines led by girls who have been school friends, according as they resist temptation or stray from the paths of duty. It may well find a place in parish libraries.

Brave and True. By Gregson Gow. (Blackie.) These four children's stories are inoffensive, but in no way marked by originality.

THE heroine of A High Resolve, by C. S. Lowndes (S.P.C.K.), fancies it unnecessary to practise this high ideal in her mind to practice the everyday virtues of good temper, sincerity, and thankfulness. How she found out her mistake during a sojourn at a farmhouse is pleasantly told. Miss Lowndes should not vex Lindley Murray's servant with such a sentence as "she does not intend to let the boys and I work you hard"; nor should she talk of the "eldest," "oldest," "biggest" of two children.

THE chief incident in Isaac Beach, Signalled by E. M. Daughish (S.P.C.K.), consists in finding a baby on a railway platform on Christmas Eve, fastened in a basket labelled "Live Stock; to be delivered at once." The guard takes it to his childless home; and the softening influence which the girl exercises on him as she grows up, and the means by which her father was discovered, are told in a graphic manner.

LADY DUNBOYNE teaches pleasantly "Daddy work that's nearest" in Aunt Lilly's (S.P.C.K.). In its 156 pages there is no lack of incidents, including a theatre on fire, and children nearly drowned by the rising tide. Most Oxford men would like to know the result of an examination for honours as quickly and satisfactorily as did the hero.

THAT a life of simple unaffected piety transcends a self-righteous disposition is well and pleasantly told in Mrs. Glen's Daughters, by F. E. Reade (S.P.C.K.). It is to be wished there were more Mr. Heath's in our large towns. Oddly enough, one prominent character possesses no surname; at least we cannot find it.

Dorothy, and other Stories, by Hope Carter (S.P.C.K.), is a collection of four children's stories, which may claim the twofold merit of being well written and fairly entertaining. The best in the collection is, in our opinion, that which the author has put in the forefront—viz., Dorothy, a little, thoughtful, nervous maid, who saves her father's life from Irish assassins, though the third, "Roger Eversand" runs it closely.

Charlie: the Story of a very Little Boy. By A. F. Jackson. (S.P.C.K.) This pretty story shows how a good servant can instruct children. It is quite the book for a nurse

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish in the course of January Mr. Henry Jephson's account of the Rise and Progress of the Political Platform in this country. The work is in two volumes, of which the first deals with the long struggle for the rights of public meeting and of free speech during the reigns of George III. and George IV. The second volume follows the progress of the Platform from the agitation for the first Reform Bill to that which preceded the Reform Act of 1832. Mr. Jephson finally treats of the position and power of the platform in the present day.

THE next volume of the Badminton Library, to be published by Messrs. Longmans in January—a very appropriate month—will deal with Skating, Curling, Tobogganing, and other Ice Sports, including (we hope) ice-boat sailing, which claims to be the fastest mode of human motion. Among a long list of contributors to the volume, we may mention the names of Messrs. J. M. Heathcote and C. G. Tebbutt, the Rev. John Kerr, and Colonel Buck.

MR. HEINEMANN will issue immediately after Christmas M. Maeterlinck's two dramas "The Princess Maleine" and "The Intruder," in one volume, with an introduction by Mr. Hall Caine, and not by Mr. Oscar Wilde, as previously announced.

MR. HEINEMANN also has nearly ready for issue in pamphlet form Mr. Beerbohm Tree's address to the Playgoers' Club on "Some Interesting Fallacies of the Modern Stage."

W. P. ANDERSON GRAHAM, the author of "Nature in Books," whose letters on the village problem have excited much interest as they appeared in the St. James's Gazette, has undertaken to write a volume on the rural migration for Messrs. Methuen's "Social Questions of the Day" series.

MR. LOCH, secretary to the Charity Organisation Society, will publish immediately with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. a small book on Old Age, Pensions, and Pauperism, being an inquiry as to the bearing of the statistics of pauperism, quoted by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and others, in support of a scheme for national pensions.

A NEW edition of Lowell's Fable for Critics, illustrated with twenty-six vignette portraits of the authors criticised and representing them in 1848, will be published early next month by Messrs. Gay & Bird. The same firm also announce as nearly ready Agnes Repplier's new volume of essays, entitled Points of View.

THE veteran journalist, Mr. G. A. Sala, has rejoined the ranks of the novelists—after a somewhat lengthy absence therefrom. He has written a story, entitled The Potter of Pfefferkuchenstein, for Messrs. Tillotson & Son. It is broadly humorous, and purports to describe the discovery of porcelain.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN is about to publish a collection of poems on African subjects by Mr. Scully.

AMONG the new volumes of verse announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for immediate publication are Love in Earnest, by Mr. J. G. F. Nicholson; and All the World Over, by "A Wanderer."

MR. FISHER UNWIN has nearly ready for publication a metaphysical work by Colonel James Boddely Keene entitled, Power and Force, Spiritual and Mental: Their Discreet Differences, Mutual Interrelation and Specific Atmospheres.

MESSRS. DEAN & SON have purchased from Mr. H. E. Bird, the well-known chess-player, the copyright of his standard works on Chess.

AN erroneous impression has apparently gained currency, that the "Matthew Tindale" of Miss Varty Smith's novel, recently referred to in the ACADEMY, is in some way connected with the well-known Deist of the last century. Matthew Tindale is, however, a plain village blacksmith, and the authoress desires it to be understood that the similarity of name is quite fortuitous.

THE annual address to the London Positivist Society will be delivered by Prof. Beesly, at Newton Hall, Fetter-lane, on Friday, January 1, at 8 p.m.

DON JOSÉ COROLEN, author of Las Cortes Catalanas and other historical works, has sent us El Código de los Usajes de Barcelona, a chapter of a nearly finished work, on which he has been engaged for fifteen years, making researches in the Archives of the Province, to be entitled "Estudio de la civilización Catalana desde la caída del imperio Romana hasta el advenimiento de la dinastía de los Borbones."

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

STILL more about Carlyle. On his well-known Irish tour, of which his own somewhat gloomy notes have been published, he was accompanied by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, then an ardent young Irish Nationalist. Sir Charles had the good sense to take notes of Carlyle's conversation, and has now prepared them for publication in the Contemporary Review, interspersed with a large number of letters of the time which he received from the Sage of Chelsea. The first instalment will appear in the January number.

A MELANCHOLY interest attaches to an article entitled, "Probability and Faith" which appears in the January number of the Contemporary Review. It is the last piece of work from the pen of the late Bishop of Carlisle, and is based on Dr. Abbott's recent review of the beliefs and teachings of Cardinal Newman. The Bishop was, as he says, "one of those—not so many of them now—who had heard Newman preach in his own pulpit of St. Mary's, Oxford."

OUR readers will remember the striking series of articles written by "E. B. Lanin" on Russian affairs which recently appeared in the Fortnightly Review. Mr. "Lanin" is about to give in the next Contemporary an account of the Russian sect, the Stundists, and of the persecution to which they have been subjected by the Government at the instigation of the Orthodox Church.

TWO features of the forthcoming number of the Century are a retrospective article by Gounod, with a frontispiece portrait of the composer representing him in the act of composition, at his right hand an organ; and an article on the Jews of New York.

MR. PINCHES'S second article on "The Old Testament in the Light of the Literature of Assyria and Babylonia" will appear in the January number of The Expository Times. The other contributors include the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol (on "The Teaching of our Lord as to the Authority of the Old Testament"); Canon Cheyne, Prof. Kennedy, Prof. A. B. Davidson, Prof. Orr, and Mr. Gwilliam.

WITH the New Year, the Welcome Hour enters on its sixteenth year, and will be published by Messrs. Digby, Long & Co. Among the contents will be a novel on entirely new lines by the editor, Mr. Percy Russell, author of "The Author's Manual," now in its fifth edition.

THE Christmas number of the Fishing Gazette will contain two plates: one, after a picture by Rolfe, entitled "The First Lesson," depicts an otter bringing a salmon-trout to its cubs; the other gives wood-engravings of the dace, chub, roach, and rudd, showing the distinguishing characteristics of the several fish.

"A NOTEWORTHY CASE" is the title of a detective experience by a Chief Constable, which will be commenced in No. 431 of Cassell's Saturday Journal, forming the first number of the New Year. In the same issue will appear a complete story by Major Arthur Griffiths, entitled "The Thames Talisman"; an article on Monte Carlo and its Gaming Tables; Mr. F. C. Burnand, of Punch, is the subject of the article on "Editors of the Day"; and the number will be illustrated by Mr. Frederick Barnard and Mr. J. F. Sullivan.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE death of the Duke of Devonshire is a greater loss to the learned world than it is (directly) to politics or society. Almost ever since he took his degree at Cambridge, in 1829, with double honours, he has been most intimately associated with academical affairs. In that very year, at the early age of twenty-one, he was returned to parliament for his university, though he forfeited the seat for supporting the Reform Bill. From 1836 to 1856, he was chancellor of London University. In 1861 the Senate at Cambridge chose him to be their own chancellor, in succession to the Prince Consort. He was also the first president of Owens College, and the first chancellor of Victoria University, both of which bodies owe much to his administrative ability. The Cavendish Laboratory at Cambridge bears witness to his munificence; while science acknowledges no less gratitude to him for serving as chairman of the Royal Commission on scientific instruction and the advancement of science.

DR. PEILE, vice-chancellor and master of Christ's, the Rev. Dr. Butler, master of Trinity, Sir Gabriel G. Stokes, M.P., and Prof. A. Macalister have been appointed to represent Cambridge at the tercentenary festival of the University of Dublin, to be held in July 1892.

THE following address, signed by nearly 200 resident graduates of Oxford, including all the heads of colleges and most of the professorial and tutorial body, has been presented on their behalf by the Vice-Chancellor to Dean Liddell:—

"The announcement of the resignation of the Dean of Christ Church has created a deep feeling of regret, not only among his personal friends, but throughout the university generally. And the feeling cannot but be shared especially by resident members of Convocation, who have had the best opportunity of knowing and appreciating his services to the university.

"Five-and-thirty years have passed since Dr. Liddell was appointed to the Deanery—years full of questions and events of the gravest academical import. Throughout that time he has held an undisputed pre-eminence among us—occupying a foremost place in the highest departments of university administration, recognised as an authority whose opinion was most valued upon the subject of university study and discipline, or those of scholarship, literature, natural science, and art and taste; ever ready with thoughtful and judicious counsel on the various matters of debate in these days of change and progress; unbiassed by party feeling, whether political or theological, and no less tolerant of the views of others than temperate and calm in the expression of his own.

"We feel, indeed, that the departure of the Dean of Christ Church will be the loss of a presence and a power in the university which it will be very difficult to replace; and we venture respectfully to request the Vice-Chancellor to be the medium of conveying to him now our grateful sense of the singleness of purpose with which he has consistently aided and encouraged whatever was deemed most likely to advance the reputation and promote the efficiency of the university; and at the same time our own share in the general regret at his retirement from the dignified position in Oxford which he has so long and so ably filled."

MR. E. W. HOBSON, of Christ's College, has been appointed deputy for Prof. Adams, the Lowndean professor of astronomy and geometry at Cambridge, for the two remaining terms of the academical year.

MR. W. K. EVANS, Clark scholar of Glasgow, has been elected to the chair of philosophy at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, vacant by the appointment of Prof. Henry Jones to St. Andrews, in succession to Prof. Seth.

THE last number of Bibliographical Contributions, issued by Harvard University, consists of a classified list of books relating to British municipal history, compiled by Dr. Charles Gross, instructor in history at Harvard, whose admirable book on The Guild Merchant was published last year by the Clarendon Press. The first portion gives general authorities; the second portion is arranged according to towns. The value of the list is much enhanced by brief notes, estimating the importance of the books. Dr. Gross states that this is only a selection from a bibliography comprising nearly 4000 titles, which he has almost ready for the press.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

CHANGE AND REST.

(In Sight of the Pyrenees.)

SHALL all our troubled life soon cease?
Our life like yonder rushing stream—
Shall purity be ours and peace,
Like yonder snowy peaks that gleam
Beneath the dazzling morning light,
And all unconscious slowly change?
Shall we like frozen flakes, once white,
Again rush on and joyous range
Adown some new and happier ways?
O mystery of life that flows,
And ebbs again, and seeks repose:
A thousand years shall seem but days.

BEATRIX L. TOLLEMACHE.

IN MEMORIAM.

ABRAHAM KUENEN.

THE course of Prof. Kuenen's uneventful life may be sketched in a very few lines.

He was born at Haarlem on September 16, 1828. His father was an apothecary in that city, and sent his son first to the Elementary School and then to the Gymnasium. Before Kuenen was fifteen his father died, and he had to leave school and take a humble place in the business. His old schoolfellows, however, would not let him drop. They walked with him on his "rounds," they included him in their clubs and societies, they gave him the position which his character and talents always secured him throughout his life, but which his singular modesty always made so simple and natural that it was never conspicuous. Older friends also interested themselves in him, and means were found of sending him back to school, and subsequently, just before his eighteenth birthday, to the University of Leiden, which he never left till his death.

His career was a series of triumphs. From the first he was a centre of life in the University; and when he took his degree of Theologiae Doctor on the strength of an edition of thirty-four chapters of Genesis from the Arabic Version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, his university found means to detain him with a minor appointment, until, in 1852, Thorbecke recommended the Crown to appoint him extraordinary Professor of Theology. In 1855 he succeeded to one of the ordinary chairs; and in the same year he married Miss Maurling, a daughter of one of the founders of the Groningen School of Theology, which made the first pronounced breach with Calvinistic orthodoxy in the Reformed Church of Holland. Kuenen himself soon became one of the main supports of the Modern Theology of which Scholten and Opzoomer were the chief founders, and of which Leiden became the headquarters. During the twenty-eight years of unbroken domestic happiness and growing academic fame that followed, Kuenen composed the chief works upon which his European reputation rests.

His Historico-Critical Inquiry, an Introduction to the Old Testament, was published in 1861-65, and followed, with independence and originality, the lines of the then dominant school of Ewald. But the germs of another view were already present, and the studies of the next few years developed them. Colenso's examination of the narrative of the Exodus, in the first part of his Pentateuch, was seen by Kuenen to be big with critical results which the author himself only realised quite shortly before his death. Popper's remarkable monograph on the construction of the Tabernacle told in the same direction; and the last volume of Kuenen's Introduction had not been out many months when Graf's bold contention, that the Levitical legislation must be regarded as later than the Deuteronomic, leapt to meet Kuenen's growing conviction that the Prophetic Narratives of Genesis, Exodus, and Numbers were older than the so-called Grundchrift, Ewald's "Book of Origins."

Kuenen at once perceived that these conclusions involved a reversal of the current view of the development of the religion of Israel; and in 1869-70 he gave the world the first constructive treatment of this great theme in harmony with modern conceptions of historical and literary criticism, of psychological possibility and impossibility, and of the general laws of evolution.

The Religion of Israel is undoubtedly Kuenen's greatest work. Bold in its defiance of tradition, it is a model of caution, sobriety, and self-restraint in its method and its conclusions. Kuenen had a genius for seeing what was there, and not what he or others had expected to find; and he employed his brilliant powers of combination and his fertility in hypothesis under the severest sense of responsibility. It was these qualities that won the admiration of such a mind as Prof. Huxley's, which recognised in Kuenen's work the essential characteristics of scientific constructiveness. And the same qualities have taught European scholarship to recognise in the Religion of Israel one of the most solid and fruitful pieces of work of the last half century.

Kuenen's next considerable work was undertaken at the instance of Dr. Muir, the Sanscritist, and consisted in a study of Hebrew Prophecy, largely polemical in its scope, and intended specially to meet the arguments of English apologists who rest theological dogmas upon the fulfilment of prophecy. This work was published in 1875 in Holland and 1877 in England. Then came the Hibbert Lectures on National and Universal Religions, delivered and published in England in 1882.

The next year brought upon Kuenen a blow from which he never fully recovered. On March 24 he lost his wife. In the autumn of the same year he presided over the Oriental Congress that met at Leiden, not allowing his private grief to interfere with the discharge of his public duties; but the strain was very severe.

He was now engaged upon a complete recasting of his Introduction. The first chapter contained the minute exposition and justification of his views on the criticism of the Hexateuch, and was brought out by Messrs. Macmillan as an independent volume—The Hexateuch—in 1886. It must long remain an authoritative work on the subject. Special attention should be called to the hypothesis provisionally advanced, that the First Code, Ex. xxi.-xxiii, which now appears in the text of the Sinaitic legislation, was originally put into the mouth of Moses as he stood in Midian before Israel crossed the Jordan. In this case it would have dictated the historical setting as it certainly dictated the general scope and arrangement of Deuteronomy. The rest of the first volume and the second volume, dealing with the Prophetic literature, have appeared in Dutch. But the author's death has left the third and concluding volume incomplete. Kuenen was also engaged in superintending an Old Testament commentary and translation by Hooymaas, Oort, Kusters, Matthes and others which is unfortunately far from finished.

Besides his great works, Kuenen wrote almost innumerable articles, papers, and reviews. Some of these were of great importance. We may instance the series of contributions to the criticism of the Hexateuch which appeared in the Theologisch Tijdschrift, and which Dr. Robertson Smith has referred to as "perhaps the finest things that modern criticism has to show"; the paper on the composition of the Sanhedrim, which Wellhausen declared would have been epoch-making had it not been buried in archives, where no one read it; his study of the genealogy of the Nassoritic text of the ages of the Patriarchs, which, if there is such a thing as finality in criticism, has set the question with which it deals at rest; and his brilliant essay on "The Men of the Great Synagogue," which gives an earnest of the discoveries that await the trained critical intelligence which shall penetrate the tangled forest of Talmudic lore.

Besides history and criticism, Kuenen lectured with extraordinary lucidity and force, although he did not write, on Ethics. Like other Dutch "Moderns," he was a staunch determinist; and if anyone had undertaken a desperate enterprise as to ruffle his more than human serenity of temper, the best chance of success would have lain in launching crude criticism or plying wilfully unintelligent questions against this point of philosophic faith. But the fact is that Kuenen's courtesy was so remarkable that it helped to establish a habit in Holland, by which the Dutch theologians of all schools contrast favourably with their brethren in other countries, and often show the world that it is possible to engage in the keenest controversies without descending to personalities or forgetting the amenities of life.

Kuenen visited England three times. Once in the sixties, when he met Colenso; once in the seventies, when he attended a meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as a deputation from the Dutch Protestant community; and once in 1882, when he delivered the Hibbert Lectures in London and Oxford. He was a great admirer of England and the English, and the only occasion on which he seemed less than perfect in the eyes of some of his countrymen was during our war with the Boers. Kuenen felt strongly with the Boers, but he pleaded a more charitable judgment of the English than the Dutch were inclined to regard as quite consistent with patriotism.

In addition to all this literary and academical work, Kuenen sat on ecclesiastical, academical, and other commissions, took active part in a hundred religious and literary movements, and was always at the service of anyone he could help.

His character inspired universal respect and admiration even among his bitterest theological opponents, and those who were privileged to know him think of him as the truest of friends and the most generous and kindly of men. He died on December 10, after a severe illness of ten weeks; but his death was quite unexpected. He leaves seven children, most of whom have completed their education. His eldest son, who is a scientific man of great promise, recently received an appointment at Leiden.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE December Livre Moderne opens with a very few "more last words," and then proceeds to wrap itself decently in a very becoming brocade, embroidered with thirty-six designs of book-plates and a large and pretty lithograph, "La Lecture Romantique," by M. Robida. The texture or text consists of another paper on book-plates themselves, of an article on Mr. Henry Morley's "English Writers," with some more of M. Drujon on "Ridicula Literaria." So sinks M. Uzanne in the ocean bed, to flame with new spangled ore in L'Art et l'Idée on the twentieth of January next without fail. Good luck to his flaming.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHARTER FOR A LONDON TEACHING UNIVERSITY.

King's College, London: Dec. 21, 1891.

To those who, like myself, supposed that the battle of the Teaching University had been fought and won, Prof. Karl Pearson's attitude is rather a rude surprise. He appears on the scene after the battle, executing a war-dance on his own account (if I may so describe his communication in last week's ACADEMY). So far as I can follow this somewhat wild and vague performance, the particular object of Prof. Pearson's hostility is King's College, and if I understand him rightly, that anachronous institution is to be rejected as dross, while University College and some other (anonymous) bodies are to be fused "as in a melting-pot" into the facsimile of a German University.

This sublimely cool proposal, at the eleventh (perhaps I ought to say the thirteenth) hour, to exclude (and consequently extirpate) King's College is drastic enough to satisfy that heroic educational reformer, the Emperor William; and, indeed, Prof. Pearson's programme generally appears to me to carry with it the tremendous postulate of a German invasion and annexation of England. For, short of that, it is quite incredible that our Legislature, in the teeth of the Privy Council, will take leave of English common sense and, instead of allowing the university to grow and develop itself from the solid nucleus of the two London colleges and the medical schools, endeavour to manufacture it mechanically "in the melting-pot" on an alien model.

However, I am only concerned with one feature of this University of Weissnichtwo. The gateway of that ideal institution is to be ornamented, it seems, with our scapals, as a warning and a lesson to the Church of England; and within the university museum—in its chamber of ecclesiastical horrors—will be exhibited a particularly terrific instrument which Prof. Pearson fancies he has inspected in our college, to wit, a "test" so "stringent," he says, as to be utterly impossible in any modern university.

Well, as the proverbial philosopher in "Miss Decima" says,

"A little truth, however small,
Is better than no truth at all."

The very small ingredient of fact in this description is that we professors of King's College have subscribed ourselves "members of the Church of England"! This does, of course, exclude Nonconformists as such, but that is all. Whether this restriction should be continued is an open question; and Prof. Pearson has a perfect right to demand, if he pleases, that King's College shall, on that ground, be wiped out of the charter, provided his argument is founded simply and solely on the denominational character of the college, which the declaration in question is merely intended to preserve.

As for that argument, Prof. Pearson will be aware, if he has read Sir George Young's authoritative letter on the subject, that it was in deference to the Nonconformists themselves, and at the instance of Mr. Miall, that new foundations on a denominational basis were permitted at Oxford and Cambridge.

But as Prof. Pearson appears to found a further argument on the actual "test" in force, I must be allowed to say that his infuriated utterance conveys an absurdly wrong impression of the formula just mentioned. It is not a "test" at all, in the sense which the term bore at the old universities previous to the reform of 1871.

For my own part, I should decline now, as I did then, to accept any such test as the so-called "Protestant Declaration" which was enforced at my own college (Trinity), or to subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, because I hold that a Protestant layman has a right which he ought not to forego (above all if he is a teacher) to absolute liberty of conscience, that is, intellectual independence in the matter of religion.

G. C. W. WARR.

National Liberal Club: Dec. 21, 1891.

All those who wish the new Teaching University of London to be really worthy of its opportunities will be glad to know that all the professors of the two colleges are not content with the narrow scheme which has been promulgated in their behalf, and they will thank Prof. Pearson for the clearness and vigour with which he has brought out the grave deficiencies of the proposed "Strand and Gower-street University." Many of them will also hope much from his courageous attempt to lift the whole matter on to a higher level, and will be ready to join hands with him in hastening to its practical accomplishment the noble ideal of a teaching university for London which he has set forth.

At the same time, it seems unfortunate that Prof. Pearson should be so evidently either afraid, or scornful, of the democratic elements in our higher education, and that he should have been unable, or unwilling, to make his ideal university comprehensive enough or broad enough to include those elements—elements the importance of which will tend rather to increase than to diminish. If in good truth this incompatibility were inevitable, then in one essential particular a teaching university in London such as Prof. Pearson has sketched would be as open to criticism as the "pettifoggling" scheme which Dr. Wace and Sir George Young hope to be able to impose upon us. But Prof. Pearson's apparent assumption—that the university ideal which he lays down and that which is in the minds of those "extension enthusiasts" who have a strong belief in its future are opposed and contradictory—is, I contend, quite unfounded. The two may rather be looked upon as different aspects of the same ideal. While, on the one side, the ideal teaching university of London should be freed from collegiate restrictions, and should be great enough to provide the highest teaching and to retain the best teachers; on the other side, it should, as the "extension enthusiasts" contend, be wide enough and broad enough to enable all classes of the inhabitants of London to attend such lectures. Nor need there be any difficulty in continuing a high standard of academic instruction with a frank acceptance of the democratic conditions which are necessary in a democratic age. Of these conditions the necessity of providing evening instruction is imperative; and indeed there seems to be no reason but custom why university professors should invariably lecture in the day time. Prof. Pearson's vision of a gigantic night school with its peripatetic teachers, however much it may be open to academic sarcasm, need not imply an inferiority of academic teaching, and is—until some ideal readjustment of the hours of labour, until some better method be discovered—the only means of opening the doors of academic instruction to that class of students, which must always be a large one in London, who have to carry on their higher education pari passu with the earning of their daily bread. This is indeed the only way that I can see of educating academically our democracy; and it seems rather putting the cart before the horse to expect, as Prof. Pearson puts it, the democracy first to educate its educators and then to educate itself.

The active workers in the Extension movement are as determined as Prof. Pearson to countenance no depreciation—the standard of degrees is low enough, in all conscience, already—and they cannot admit his charge that they "have lost all sense of its true limits and all real appreciation of academic instruction." It is, on the contrary, because they are so entirely possessed by the value of a high standard of university teaching that they wish it to be brought as close as possible to those classes who at present are debarred from it; and it is because they are so entirely conscious of the present shortcomings and deficiencies of the University Extension movement, unsupported as it now is by academic recognition, that they are anxious to see its scope widened, and its work consolidated, by that control and that guidance which only a real teaching university can provide. And the nearer the new Teaching University of London approaches Prof. Pearson's ideal, the stronger will be their determination to share in its privileges; and in spite of Prof. Pearson's scorn they are still inclined to think that a worse danger might befall the new university than the admission of the University Extension movement to some voice in the direction of its policy, some share in the adaptation of its resources to the educational advancement of our democracy.

THE AUTHOR OF CHAUCER'S "BOOK CLEPED VALERIE."

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk.

CHAUCER twice makes mention of "Valerie," both times in connexion with the subject of women and the undesirability of marriage. The first reference is in the "Wyf of Bathes Prologue," where we are told that the "joly clerk Jankyn"

"had a book, that gladly night and day
For his desport he wolde rede alway;
He clepyd it Valerye and Theofrast,
At whiche book he lough alway ful fast.

And every night and day was his custume
Whan he hadde leysir and vacacioun
From other worldly occupacioun,
To reden in this book of wikked wyves."

(vv. 669 ff.)

The other is in the Prologue to the "Legend of Good Women," where the God of Love, speaking of books against women, asks:

"What seith Valerie, Titus, or Claudian?" (v. 280.)

Chaucer probably got his knowledge of this "Valerius" at secondhand from the Roman de la Rose, in which the latter is frequently mentioned (cf. vv. 9440, 9470, 9478, 10168). From Jean de Meun's description of him as:

"Valerius, qui se doloit
De ce que Rufinus se voloit Marier, qui ses compains iere," we are enabled to identify him with the writer of the Epistola Valerii ad Rufinum de uxore non ducenda. But who was the author of this Epistola? Francisque-Michel boldly states that it was Valerius Maximus, an obviously impossible attribution, as the work is evidently of a much later date. In the Abbé Migne's Patrologie Latine the epistle is printed among the works of Saint Jerome, to whom it was attributed probably on account of its similarity to another work of his, Adversus Jovinianum (see below). Neither Tyrwhitt, Sandras (Etude sur Chaucer, p. 189), nor Skeat (Legend of Good Women, p. 140) gives any conjecture as to who the author was; and M. Langlois, in his exhaustive work Origines et Sources du Roman de la Rose (Paris, 1891), confesses himself equally at fault. "Jean de Meun," he remarks,

"a emprunté plusieurs de ses traits satiriques contre les femmes à un certain Valérius, dont il cite plusieurs fois le nom. Qui était ce personnage? On n'a aucun renseignement sur son compte" (p. 140).

In the preface to his edition of the Latin Poems commonly attributed to Walter Mapes (London, 1841), Wright says:

"The only prose writings now known, which go under the name of Walter Mapes, are a treatise entitled De Nugis Curialium, and a tract entitled Valerius ad Rufinum (sic) de non ducenda uxore."

In a discussion as to the origin of Histoire LV. in Le Viciolier des Histoires Romaines

(Paris, 1858), M. G. Brunet mentions that a similar story is given by John Bromyard (end of the fourteenth century) in his Summa Predicantium, and he adds:

"Bromyard allègue l'autorité de Valère, voulant sans doute indiquer ainsi, non Valère-Maxime, mais l'ouvrage qu'un auteur anglois du XIII^e. (sic) siècle, Walter Mapes (sic), écrivit, sous le nom de Valère, sur les inconvénients du mariage (Valerius ad Rufinum, de non ducenda uxore)."

Both Wright and Brunet, then, were of opinion that the so-called "Valerius" was identical with Walter Map. This opinion was well founded, for we have it on the unimpeachable authority of no less a personage than Walter Map himself that he was the author of the work in question. M. Gaston Paris, in a brief notice of an essay of Pio Rajna on Andrea Fieschi's De Dissuasione Uxorationis (which is an imitation of the Epistola ad Rufinum), refers to a passage in the De Nugis Curialium (Wright's edition, p. 142), in which Map expressly states that the Epistola Valerii ad Rufinum was his own composition (see Romania xix. p. 624).

Map gives the text of his letter, and prefaces it with an account of the circumstances under which it was written. Having found that a certain friend of his had suddenly become gloomy and unsociable, he inquires the cause, and discovers that Dame Venus is at the bottom of it all. He hopes that it may prove to be only a passing fancy, but is soon given to understand that his friend in no wise regards the matter as a joke, but is seriously bent upon matrimony. After remonstrating with him in vain in person and by proxy, Map makes up his mind to write to him, which he does, assuming himself the name of Valerius, and addressing his friend, who is red-haired (rufus), under that of Rufinus:

"Inciditamicum habui, virum vitæ philosophicæ, quem post longa tempora multasque visitationes annotavi semel habitu, gestu, vultuque mutatum, suspiciosum, pallidum, lautius tamen cultum, loquentem parcius et gravius, insolita simulate superbum; pristina perierat facetia, morosaque jocunditas; ægrum se dicebat, et male sanus erat. Solivagum vidi, meaque, quantum reverentia mei sinebat, declinantem alloquia. Veneris arreptitium vidi. Quicquid enim videbatur, totum erat proci, nihil philosophi. Spes tamen erat, ut post lapsum resurgeret. Ignoscebam quod ignorabam; ludum putabam, et erat sævum serium. Uxorari tendebat, non amari; Mars nolebat fieri, sed Mulciber. Tamen mihi mens excidit, et quia mori pergebat, commorlebar et. Locutus sum et repulsus. Misi qui loquerentur, et ut noluit eos audire, dixi: 'Fera pessima devoravit unicum* meum, et ut omnes amicitias vices implerem, epistolam ei scripsi, mutatis nominibus nostris, me qui Walterus sum Valerium vocans, ipsum, qui Johannes est et rufus, Rufinum. Prætitulavi epistolam sic: Dissuasio Valerii ad Rufinum philosophum ne uxorem ducat.'"*

After transcribing the letter, Map mentions the fact that it had attained immense popularity, but complains that he was not allowed the credit of having written it. From which it appears that even in Map's own day there were doubts as to its authorship.

"The fact is," he says, "that if I had written it under my own name no one would have taken any notice of it, for nothing that is modern can possibly be allowed to have any merit. Antique copper will always be preferred to new gold. I wrote it, therefore, under an assumed name, in order to give it the appearance of antiquity. Hence it has come about that, because I happen to be in the land of the living (a misfortune, of course, which I might remedy if I had a mind to), and because the letter happens to be considered a meritorious composition, the idea that I can have written it is scouted as ridiculous. Doubtless years hence, when I am rotting in my grave, justice will be done in this matter."

*Sic; probably amicum should be read.

"Scimus hanc placuisse multis, avide rapitur transcribitur intente, plena jocunditate legitur Meam tamen esse quidam, sed de plebe, negant Epistolæ enim invident, decorem suum ei violentz auferunt et auctorem. Hoc solum deliqui, quo vivo. Verumtamen hoc morte mea corrigere consilium non habeo. Nomina nostra nominibus mortuorum in titulo mutavi. Sciebam enim hoc placere. Sin autem, abjecissent illam, ut me Volens igitur huic insulsæ providere paginulæ ne mittatur in coenium a fago (?), latere mecum eam jubebat. Scio quid fiet post me. Cum enim puterim, tum primo sal accipiet, totusque eis supplebitur decessu meo defectus, et in remotissimis posteritate mihi faciet auctoritatem antiquitatis, quia tum, ut nunc, vetustum cuprum præferetur auro novello. . . . Omnibus seculis sua displicuit modernitas, et quævis ætas a prima præteritam sibi prætulit; unde quia non poterunt epistolam meam mea spreverunt tempora."

It must be confessed that posterity has been very tardy in the performance of this particular act of justice. M. Paris remarks upon the singular destiny that has attended Walter Map in his literary capacity. After having enjoyed a brilliant reputation as a wit during the twelfth century, and having been credited with the composition of all sorts of works in French and Latin in which he had no hand whatever, he has been persistently denied the credit of the opusculum of which he was so proud, while his well-authenticated work (the De Nugis Curialium) is preserved in only one MS., and is almost unknown.*

It may be noted that Wright prints a Latin poem, De Coniuge non Ducenda, among those attributed to Map, with French (beginning of fourteenth century) and English (fifteenth century) translations of the same.

In the passage quoted above from the "Wyf of Bathes Prologue" Chaucer couples the name of "Valerye" with that of "Theofrast," whom he mentions several times again in the "Marchaundes Tale" as one of the "clerkes" who deny that "To take a wyf is a glorious thing."

"Ne take no wif, quod he, for housboudrye,
As for to spare in household thy dispense;
A trewe servaunt doth more diligence
Thy good to kepe, than thin oughne wif,
For sche wol clayme half part in al hir life.
And if that thou be seek, so God me save,
Thyne verray frendes or a trewe knave
Wol kepe the bet than sche that waytith ay
After thy good, and hath doon many a day.

This entent, and an hundrid sithe wors,
Writith this man, ther God his bones curs.
But take no keep of al such vanité;
Defy Theofrast, and herke me." (vv. 52 ff.)

Chaucer's authority here again was probably Jean de Meun, who tells us the name of the book he made use of, or rather pretended to make use of; for as a matter of fact, the book itself is lost. All that now remains is a single short passage, which Saint Jerome has preserved, in a Latin version, in his Adversus Jovinianum, and which John of Salisbury has reproduced in the Polygenicon, whence Jean de Meun derived his knowledge of it. The latter would have us believe, however, that he had read the work itself:

"Ha! se Theofrates crüsse
Ja fame espousée n'cüsse:
Il ne tient pas home por sage
Qui fame prent par mariage,

*Wright in his Latin Poems of Walter Mapes (p. ix.) says there are two MSS. of the De Nugis at Oxford, one in the Bodleian, and another in the Merton College library. In the Preface to his edition of the De Nugis he corrects this statement and says: "The work now first published is unfortunately preserved in only one MS. (in the Bodleian, MS. Bodley, No. 851), and that is an incorrect one." Of the Epistola Valerii numerous MSS. exist: a fact which bears out Map's statement as to its popularity.

puted; but they are poor, pallid, blurred things, which ill-support the deservedly high reputation of the artists.

Toilers in Art. Edited by Henry C. Ewart. With ninety Illustrations. (Isbister.) "Toilers in Art" seems scarcely a happy title for men who have achieved such delightful mastery as Flaxman and Bewick, as Israels and Lalanne, as Frederick Walker and Frederic Shields, not to mention other names in this distinguished company. It appears to have been chosen in order to give the editor the opportunity of printing, in the shape of an Introduction, a dull little sermon on a well-worn text. We know nothing of Mr. Ewart; but we do not understand what he has done to justify the appearance of his name on the title-page of a book written by other men, all of whom appear to be quite as capable of "editing" their work. What, for instance, is the use of an editor who allows "consumption" to pass as a correct translation of consummatio? But the book itself contains a great deal of interesting matter about many interesting men; and though the principle of selection is not apparent, the choice might have been more commonplace. We have, for instance, Oscar Pletsch and C. H. Bennett, artists who should not be forgotten now that the generation which they delighted is growing old, and fresh designers have taken their place in public favour. Some French artists are included, like Jean Paul Laurens and François Louis Français, who are not as well known in England as they should be. And finally, the book contains an interesting autobiographical sketch of Frederic Shields, the most freshly and sincerely inspired of all English artists who have dared the greater themes of spiritual art.

Decorative Electricity. By Mrs. J. E. H. Gordon. With a Chapter on "Fire Risks," by J. E. H. Gordon. (Sampson Low.) This eminently practical little book is also very entertaining. Mr. Gordon's interest in the subject is communicated in a lively manner to her readers. So that though she deals with facts, and facts mainly of science, she is always bright and clear. There is certainly a fascination about electric lighting which exceeds that of ordinary methods of illumination. It has a touch of magic—of the infinite, we may say, about it, which belongs neither to gas nor petroleum. Its effect upon art is also greater, for it leaves so much more freedom to the designer. His fancy has the freest play as to position and direction, as this light may hang or spirt out unsupported from anywhere, and it throws neither "right side up" nor "topsy turvy." So electricity stimulates the decorative invention, and "decorative electricity" is a subject which will not be exhausted for many a day. The present book, however, is less æsthetic than useful, being full of knowledge and experience as to the lighting of houses by electricity, which cannot fail to be of value to the many who are now placing themselves in the hands of electrical engineers. They will still be, to a very great extent, at the mercy of these engineers, whatever hints they may get from Mrs. Gordon; but she will open their eyes a good deal and amuse them into the bargain.

Reynolds and Children's Portraits in England. By W. J. Loftie. (Blackie.) This is another of the Vere Foster series, and a worthy companion of similar works on landscape and animal painting. The illustrations are from very popular works, the "Angel Heads" and "Child Samuel" (for instance), by Reynolds; the "Blue Boy," by Gainsborough; and "Cherry Ripe," by Millais. Each coloured print is accompanied by a well-drawn outline. As to the colouring we cannot speak in unreserved praise, it is generally heavy and hot. The book, however, on the whole, deserves the popularity which it is sure to achieve. Besides the painters before mentioned, there are good examples of Romney and Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Engravings and Their Value. By J. H. Slater. (Upcott Gill.) This book is entitled "A Guide for the Print Collector," but it may be safely said that no collector worthy of the name will ever be guided by it. It is a mere compilation, done without care and without knowledge. The author, in his advice to purchasers, recommends them to look out for "burr," as if it were to be found in every description of engraving. He informs them that the process of "line engraving" has become very common of recent years, whereas everybody else knows that it has been almost beaten out of the field by etching and photography; and he speaks of acquainting as a method especially adapted to those subjects requiring tints of extreme delicacy or excessive depth. When we come to the accounts of the engravers, we find the information equally misleading. One instance will be sufficient—that of Hogarth. Mr. Slater gives no account whatever of the prints as published separately by Hogarth; he begins with the collections published by Cook and others off the well-worn plates, long after Hogarth's death. So completely ignorant of the subject is he that he adds, after a description of these "collections"—which no collector would look at—"Separate prints are also frequently met with, but most of these are from worn plates, and many not from the original plates at all." Besides this, he gives the collector no other guidance than the prices which a few of Hogarth's prints have fetched. He includes Sir Edwin Landseer, but not his brother Thomas, who, of course, as an engraver was much more important; and he does not mention J. M. W. Turner. Altogether, this is a book to be carefully avoided by collectors and others.

A Short History of the British School of Painting. By George H. Shepherd. (Sampson Low.) This is a second edition, with a charming frontispiece in the shape of a reduction of Mr. Hole's wonderful etching of Old Crome's "Mill on the Yare." Perhaps this is its chief claim to notice. The fact that a second edition has been called for is a sign that the book fills a want. It is, as the title professes, a "short" history, and therein, perhaps, lies one secret of its success. It is clear, handy, and full of information about artists, not only dead but living. It has no great pretensions, but we know of no other book which quite fills its place as a work of reference. In what other book, for instance, can you find in the index the names of Stanhope Forbes, and J. M. Swan, as well as those of Hogarth and Reynolds.

THE FETTES DOUGLAS SALE.

FROM his youth up, the late president of the Royal Scottish Academy was an enthusiastic and discerning collector of books and art objects; and more than once he was obliged to part with the gatherings of years, on the occasion of changes of residence or departure for prolonged visits to the continent. His fine cabinet of mediæval medals, it will be remembered, was sold at Christie's several years ago. It was supposed probable, by several of his friends, that, on his death, certain objects in his collection, more interesting for their local or nationally historical significance than valuable in a monetary sense, would have passed directly into the keeping of one or other of the public and national institutions with which Sir William Fettes Douglas was officially connected, and to whose interests unwearied assiduity, however, not realised practically in its entirety, Edinburgh, during the Saturday.

The sale was an interest hardly so from the point of fashionable and monied book-dealers whose pleasure—an purvey for the same. Sir William who loved beautiful things as he was something of a scholar books, and enjoyed to have them and—let it be whispered—he liked of these latter as least as exteriors or the seemliness of them was a book collector who read as at his treasures.

Then, again, the kind of beauty which, even in the exteriors of the book he gathered, was hardly the exact sort that appeals most convincingly to, so perous and not uncultured Glasgow Sir William was a painter; and he happier, never more successful, than subject of his brush was, or included volume, with its worn binding, rusted and time-worn page, where the touch or the tint of crimson gleamed out from sober, time-toned vellum. One of the copies of his bindings, one that he used to show handle with especial gusto, was the little Book of Hours, printed at Strasburg in This binding, the original covering of the was of decoratively stamped and letter vellum, stained carmine; but then its clasp gone, its back ribs were worn—nay, show signs of cracking, and, in its lateral design, the original hue of the vellum had begun to gleam white through the rosinness with which the skin had been covered four hundred years ago. It was a thing to fascinate any born colourist: one piece of gold and some five of silver marked its value, as estimated in our modern currency. Two of the richest of the armorial bindings—Clavii Christophori Algebræ (Rome, 1608), red morocco, stated to be Italian, but possibly French, and Bishop Lesley's De Origine Moribus . . . Scotorum (Rome, 1578), a green morocco, stamped with an admirable though rather simple design, including the arms of Pope Gregory XIII., were wisely acquired for £1 12s. and £6 10s. respectively, by the Museum of Science and Art, an institution which also purchased at reasonable prices some of the finest of the ivories, such as the fourteenth century, North Italian, group of three saints, a piece quaintly and tellingly decisive in the leading lines of its draperies, and both curious and beautiful in its applied colouring (25 guineas). To this museum also fell, for but eight guineas, a powerful bronze "Grotesque Ram's Head, with Horns and Wings," of Italian Renaissance work. A curious and rare circular metal boss, probably of late sixteenth century, bearing quartered arms, manifestly Scotch, but as yet unidentified, realised £3 10s. The Jacobite and the Commonwealth pamphlets—things with whose current cost the predilections of a certain well-known and cultured Scottish peer have an intimate connexion—fetched famine prices. Among the manuscripts, a commission to Aloysius Molinus, dated in 1502, from the Ducal Palace, by that Doge Loredano whom Bellini portrayed in the National Gallery picture, showing an example in its title-page of singularly restrained and artistic late Venetian illumination, realised £4 15s. The pictures were, without exception, small cabinet works of excellent quality; and here a McTaggart, the finished small picture for his diploma work, "Dora," from Tennyson's poem, in the Scottish National Gallery, fetched sixty guineas.

W. M. F. PETRIE has established his quarters this season at Tel el-Amarna, and asily engaged, with a gang of native urers, in clearing the ruins of the palace of en-Aten, the mysterious so-called "heretic ng," who succeeded, as some suppose, or, as others believe, was identical with, Amenhotep
IV. In view of Padre de Cara's new theory, that Khu-en-Aten was a woman-Pharaoh, it is much to be hoped that Mr. Petrie will come upon some conclusive historical data of this reign.

THE fifth ordinary general meeting of the members of the Egypt Exploration Fund will be held in the hall of the Zoological Society, Hanover-square, on January 15 at 4 p.m. Sir
John Fowler, president, will be in the chair.

WE may also mention that a cyclorama of "Ancient Egypt" was opened this week at Niagara Hall, Westminster. It consists of an immense representation of the city of Memphis, at the moment of the departure of the Israelites, painted by Herr Edmund Berninger, who is understood to have received advice in archaeological details from Prof. Ebers. The entrance to the building has been fitted up in imitation of a modern street in Cairo.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE hear that the collection of fictile ivories formed by Prof. J. O. Westwood—which is probably the most extensive and complete that has ever been got together, and which has been of material aid to the professor in his researches and publications on that branch of the fictile art—may, probably, be secured by Mr. C.
Drury E. Fortnum, D.C.J., and presented by him to the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. We hear, however, that this important acquisition and its liberal gift to Oxford must depend on the favourable result of the arrangements in contemplation for the building and endowment of the projected new museum in connexion with the University Galleries for the housing of the Ashmolean treasures. This collection of fictile ivories would, in illustration of the rise and progress of the plastic art, fill the wide gap between the works of classical times and those of the Renaissance, which latter are well represented by original examples in the Fortnum collection.

WE are glad to learn that the proposal to put up Mr. Onslow Ford's statue of Lord Strathmairn in Eaton-square has been abandoned, and that a most suitable site has been found and fixed upon at the junction of the Brompton-road with Knightsbridge.

THE choice series of water-colour drawings, representative of the English school, which have been presented to the nation by the daughters of the late Sir Prescott Hewett, are now on view at the South Kensington Museum.
They number fifty-one in all, including works by several living members both of the Old Society and the Institute, and one by Sir
Prescott himself.

So long ago as 1883, the Government of India passed resolutions for the conservation of ancient monuments, and directed that lists should be drawn up for each province. Such a list was compiled for Madras by Dr. Burgess and Mr. Sewell in 1885, which comprised more than 500 monuments, and 300 more have been added in a subsequent list. Last year the Government issued a fresh resolution, imposing a more stringent duty of conserving ancient monuments upon the several departments of public works. Accordingly, a new list has been drawn up for Madras by Mr. Alexander Rea, superintendent of the archaeological survey of Southern India, who is, we believe, an architect by profession. The number of monuments is reduced to 108, selected as typical of the architectural periods to which they belong, and each of them has been personally inspected by Mr.
Rea. The following is the classification adopted:
Buddhist remains (250 B.C. to 500
A.D.), only in the north; Pallava caves and structures (500 to 700 A.D.); Chola and Pandyan temples (from the eleventh century), chiefly in the south; Chalukyan temples (twelfth to fourteenth century), confined to Bellary; Jaina temples (from the fourteenth century); later Dravidian temples, including those at Vijayanagar; examples of civil and military architecture; Christian remains, principally Dutch tombs. Suggestions are made for the better maintenance of each monument; and, finally, attention is called to the importance of keeping untouched the numerous prehistoric stone enclosures and ancient mounds which are to be found everywhere throughout the country.

THE STAGE.

THE "Godpapa" of Messrs. F. C. Philips and Charles Brookfield pursues its merry course at the Comedy. It is very likely not quite so laughable, nor quite so risky, as its predecessor,
"Jane"; but it is well enough planned, well enough acted, and certainly succeeds in pleasing.
It is possibly rather unfortunate that its best act is its first—we, at all events, experienced some sense of dejection: we found ourselves laughing less heartily and less continuously.
But we cannot honestly say that we found the audience generally to be of our mind on this matter. The audience generally, having once got upon the track of amusement, was content —albeit with diminished material—to be amused to the end. The act which we deem most amusing is that in which the greatest business is done at the matrimonial agency; and though the complications in the later acts arise out of this business in some measure, yet they are not directly connected with it. Acted as it is, however, and written and arranged quite smartly on the whole, "Godpapa" will, we are sure, outlast the most long-drawn of Christmas holidays. Mr. C. H. Hawtreay is admirably imperturbable and commendably steady.

Reginald, who is in some sort a hero,
W. F. Hawtreay is good as Mr. Craven, several gentlemen, not yet perhaps very fresh,
attest their capacity to be amusing.
Wyes, who elects in the piece to call his "Pygmalion," is one of these. His good-

Miss Annie Irish is too well acquainted with her craft, and is moreover much too clear-and acceptable a personality, to fall as young matrimonial agent; but we have her in parts that have been more con-the display of her talents. Miss Vane Peck-stone is authoritative, and Miss Violet Abruster very handsome and agreeable, in the too remunerative characters it is their obli-to assume. One or two good-looking persons, with whose names we are unacquainted, are seen in the first act; but perhaps the character of the play—the one at all which is made most constantly effective—which is assumed by Miss Lottie Venne, who in the present, just as in former pieces, piquante and as pleasantly acidulated as possible to be. One may smile considerably the ingenious entertainment which authors comedians afford.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

My Thoughts on Music and Musicians.
H. Heathcote Statham. (Chapman & H.)
The author, in his preface, hopes that some the "critical judgments" suggested in pages, may be of interest to musicians. It always interesting to read opinions formed lightly or hastily; and the fact that one of them "run counter to the received opi-
of the day" only adds to the interest.

In the chapter on Mozart, Mr. Statham us clearly see the standard by which he judges composers, great and small. Regular rhythm and rounded form are essentials. Mozart possessed both, and hence was "the most perfect of musical composers." At the present moment when the whole musical world is paying homage to the memory of the composer of "Le Giovanni," the "Jupiter" Symphony, and the Requiem, Mr. Statham, in his words of praise and admiration, is not running counter to the opinions of the day, and the most enthusiastically admiring of modern music can endorse many his statements. But the genius of Mozart is now recognized because he triumphed over regular rhythm; and Mr. Statham merely makes use of the composer's fame to glorify force and symmetry for their own sakes, and to belittle other great composers. He makes Mozart the text for a tirade against Wagner.
"Mozart's butler and page and waiting-maid will outlast Wagner's gods and goddesses, and even the singing dragon." But of this kind of warfare one has heard enough. Mr. Statham indeed, devotes a whole chapter to Wagner, and pours out the vials of his wrath in no measured terms. The readers of that chapter should carefully note the introductory remarks. The author based his criticisms of the "Ring Nibelungen" and "Tristan" on a study of the scores; and

"subsequent acquaintance with the works by the hearing of the ear has not given me reason to any of the opinions I had formed from the perusal of the scores, except that some passages of performance, equal the effect which the led me to anticipate."

To express opinions respecting Wagner's dramas from a paper study, and then to wards, to lend only an ear to them, is presumption and prejudice; and this un-

Niddhāpeti.

Dedham School, Essex.

This verb, not in Childers's Dictionary, seems peculiar to the Jātaka-book, where the following passage occurs: "Tato galavinītena purisā niddhāpayimsu mam" (Jāt. iv., p. 41), (Then the men having taken me by the throat put me out). In prose this would be expressed by "Atha mam givāya gāhāpetvā niharāpayimsu" (see Jāt. iv., p. 41, ll. 6, 21, and compare Jāt. iv., pp. 205, 382).

In Jāt. iv., p. 48, "Niddhāmasē tam sakā-agarā," the true reading appears to be niddhāpaye (the reading of the Burmese MSS.) = "panāmetum vattati" of the prose text (Jāt. iv., p. 48, l. 12), and equivalent to nikkaddhi (Jāt. iv., p. 48, l. 27).

In Jāt. iii. 99, "Katham nu sakhāmigam dakkhisāma niddhāpitam * rājakulato va jam-mam" we find niddhāpita for niddhāpita, explained in the Commentary by nichchuddha, nikkhamita, and in the prose text by nikkhuddhāpita. Prof. Kern suggests that niddhāpita is the true reading; Dr. Fausböll, however, defends his lection, and would refer niddhāpayati to the Skt. nirddhāpayati from dhmā "to blow." But this root with nis gives us in Pāli the causal niddhamayati or niddhameti "to expel," so that niddhāpeti probably comes from some other source.

The reading niddhāpita "extinguished," is due perhaps to some confusion of niddhāpeti with niddhāpiti (see Mil., pp. 134, 139; Suttavibhaṅga I., pp. 17, 43). Compare Prakrit nirvāhida = nirvāhita, explained by the Com. K as nibbāsita (Čakuntalā, ed. Williams, p. 256).

In proposing a different explanation of niddhāpeti, we must bear in mind the common interchange of p and v. Compare Pāli dhopana with Skt. dhovana, &c. This enables us to refer niddhāpeti to a form niddhāveti* = niddhāvayati* (a causal from the root dhāv to run) "to cause to go out," "to expel." Compare Mahāvastu, pp. 359, 364; Saddhamma-P. iv. 62. In Saddhamma-pundarika iii. 89 (see Kern's translation, S. B. E., p. 88), we find nirvāhāvanārthāya "for evading," "for escaping from,"

* The various lections are niddhāpitam (Sīhāless) niddhāpitam (Burmese).

"for getting rid of," for which there is the various reading nirvāpanārthāya,* which exhibits the same sort of confusion of nirvāhāvana with nirvāpana as the Jātaka text does with regard to niddhāpeti and niddhāpeti†.

With regard to the two forms, Prof. Fausböll says: "Enten vi vælge niddhāpitam eller niddhāpitam kommer omtrent ud paa et. De kunne naturligvis ligesom ethvert andet egentligt Udtryk bruges i metaforisk Betydning."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, Nov. 30.)

MR. J. E. FOSTER gave some notes on "Two Books printed by Siberch, now in the Library of All Souls' College, Oxford." The number of copies of the books printed at Cambridge by Siberch is so small that it is advisable that a note of the present custody of all those known should be made. I therefore call attention to copies of two which are in the library of All Souls' College, Oxford, one of which has been noticed, but in an imperfect manner, while the other seems to have escaped attention altogether. The former is a copy of the "Galen" printed on vellum, to which a special interest attaches. There is, as is well known, in the Bodleian another copy of the book printed on vellum. The leaves in the last quire of this copy have been wrongly imposed, and consequently the text is not continuous, and the proper last page is followed by two pages which should precede it. This is not the case with the copy in All Souls' library, the imposition of which is correct. In other respects it does not differ from the paper copies, and the first letter on the title page is misprinted "C" as in them. This copy is noted in Mr. Bradshaw's Bibliographical Notes on the Siberch books attached to the reprint of the "Bullocus," but without any note of its being on vellum. The second book in All Souls' library is a copy of the "Balduinis." There appears to be nothing specially to note about this. This copy is not mentioned in Mr. Bradshaw's Bibliographical Notes.

RUSKIN SOCIETY.—(Friday, Dec. 11.)

THE REV. J. P. FAUNTHORPE in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. James P. Smart, Junr., on "Unto this Last." The lecturer said that political economy was a subject which had always deeply interested Mr. Ruskin, so much so that he continually introduced it into his writings on art. To Mr. Ruskin political economy meant personal conduct; and as he considered the teaching of the orthodox professors of the science encouraged selfishness, he regarded their system of mercantile economy with the greatest contempt. Mr. Smart, however, considered Ruskin's teaching as supplementary to Mill's, and not as opposed to it. Ruskin endeavours to do what he accuses the "dismal science" people of not doing—he takes into account the influences of social affection, of morality, and of religion; he takes the science of political economy, touches it with emotion, and produces a science of life based on the highest morality. It was what Mr. Ruskin saw of the result of unjust conduct that caused him to turn his attention to political economy, rather than any particular love of the subject; and that was why his treatment of it was emotional rather than scientific. Unto this Last was a protest against injustice and selfishness, and the inculcation of generous justice was its principal theme. A few of Mr. Ruskin's definitions were then compared with Mill's. Mr. Ruskin, taking a wider view of the subject, conveys to us "flashes of inspiration" in "burning words"; while Mill, always cool and calm in his reasoning, is the safer guide through the intricacies of the science. The weak parts of Unto this Last are among those in which Mr. Ruskin attacks Mill and the other economists. These criticisms are shallow and captious, and a disfigurement to the book. The lecturer concluded by saying—"it is to the study and practice of the principles of political economy that we must look for that social improvement which is so much desired and sought after at the present time. To study these principles scientifically, we must go to such writers as Mill and Fawcett; but to study them practically, to study them as they affect our conduct and our lives, we must go to Mr. Ruskin."

* In Pāli we should expect niddhāvanārthāya and niddhāpanārthāya.

† There is a Prakrit niddhāveti "driven out," in Jacobi's Ausgewählte Erzählungen in Mahārāshtri, p. 3, l. 4.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES OF SCOTLAND.—(Monday, Dec. 14.)

DR. ROBERT MONRO, one of the secretaries, read a curious paper upon "The Trepanning of the Human Skull in Prehistoric Times," apropos of a skull, bearing marks of the operation, which had been presented to the society by the Marquis of Bute, its president. Dr. Monro brought under the notice of the society the various most recent theories upon the subject, and elaborately discussed the question whether the purpose of the operation in prehistoric times was medical or hieratic. Mr. Gray, curator of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, followed with a communication upon "Scottish Heraldic and Other Painted Glass, existing in or connected with Scotland;" supplementing and—in a few points—correcting a list of such objects submitted by Mr. Seton to the society in 1887. Mr. Gray's remarks were mainly based upon the original examples and full-sized coloured drawings collected in the Heraldic Exhibition, of which he was chief acting secretary, held last year in Edinburgh; and he specially concentrated his remarks upon a hitherto undescribed rondel, preserved for at least a century at Woodhouselee, which he exhibited. This glass is dated 1600, and displays the impaled arms of James VI. and his Queen. The meeting concluded with a communication from Mr. J. T. Beer, upon "A Submarine Deposit of Samian Ware off the Coast of Kent."

FINE ART.

ART BOOKS.

"GREAT ARTISTS" SERIES. — David Cox and Peter De Wint. By Gilbert R. Redgrave. (Sampson Low.) The appearance of a volume devoted to David Cox and De Wint in the "Great Artists" series is one more sign that the real worth of our old water-colour school is beginning to be more generally appreciated. It is true that they were also painters in oil-colours, and that David Cox's reputation in both mediums is now equally high, but this fact would scarcely have secured either a place among Messrs. Sampson Low's "Great Artists," if the English school of water-colour painting had not of late years risen in popular esteem and admiration. Mr. Gilbert Redgrave has taken great pains to make his little book interesting and accurate, and has supplemented his well compiled Lives by a useful list of the works of both men which appeared at the exhibition of the Water-colour Society. For Cox, Mr. Redgrave had ample biographical material in the volumes of Solly and Hall; and in the case of De Wint, the information contained in the memoir by Mr. Armstrong has been reinforced by a MS. left by De Wint's widow. It is difficult to say whether he has been more successful in his abridgment of the abundant information about Cox, or in eking out the sparse record of De Wint. He has done both well. At the same time, it must not be supposed that he has added nothing of his own. The book contains much in the way of clear description and sound criticism for which he is responsible, and he has shown good judgment in the selection of the illustrations. We wish we could add a word in praise of the way that these have been exe-

Coach, sub. 1, b. "Slow coach" is given, but no reference is found. Hoppe (in his Preface) incidentally quotes: "Our present one [girl] is an awful slow coach" from Ramsay's Reminiscences of Scottish Life.

Coal, sub. 1. References to 897 and 1240 are given. Hence one to 1000 might come in useful. It is found sub. 10.

Cock-and-bull. Not given as a compound sub. unless attributively used. Hence the following may be of interest: "it is of course a 'cock-and-bull' as old as the hills, but the baron took it quite seriously." (ACADEMY, September 24, 1887, p. 197.)

Cocker. The famous mathematician's name is not deemed worthy of a place. Now, when Lord Byron (Don Juan, 16, 98) speaks of "Cocker's rigours," by dispensing with which "Exchequer Chancellors grow quite figurative with their figures," it is perhaps doubtful whether the word should be included. But when "Thomas Ingoldsby, Esquire," tells of "Privy-purse Humez, who scouted in his room is, And Cocker in hand in his leatherbacked chair Is puzzling . . ." etc. (Auto-da-Fé.)

then there can hardly be any doubt. The word is no longer a proper name, but an appellative; and although as such it may perhaps not be passing into common use, the phrase, "according to Cocker," is perhaps common enough to substantiate the claim to admission.

Cockpit. When we meet with the definite article before this word there is a presumption that the theatre of that name is meant, which is said to have been built in 1616 (Fleay Chron. History, p. 253). What are we to think of the following quotation from Ben Jonson's "Epicœne":

"Who will wait on us to coach then? or write, or tell us the news then, make anagrams of our names, and invite us to the Cockpit, and kiss our hand all the play-time, and draw their weapons for fair honour?" (iv. 2 ed. Cunningham I., p. 440 a: see ib., p. 440b, where the Cockpit is mentioned amid bear beating, and other public places).

We are, unfortunately, not in a position to judge on what basis Mr. Fleay's date rests. If it is not absolutely certain, our quotation would go far to score a point for the hypothesis that the Cockpit should be earlier. If not the theatre, it must mean the pit in one. So in any case we have an earlier quotation than the one given.

Colle is not given as an interjection. Yet a writer of authority, not very long ago, included it as such in a M. English Glossary; * and Mr. Henry Bradley—see his Strattmann—is not certain whether it is an adj. "cunning," or a nickname, or a proper name (in "Thensaugh J. Colle tregetour," Chaucer's "House of Fame.") We think there can be no doubt that it is a proper name, not only in Chaucer, but also in the passage in the York Plays: i. Pas. "We colle!" iii. Past. "What care is comen to be?" See the context, York Plays 119-39. We beg to submit to the editress of that volume—we use the word on the authority of Mr. Bradley's first Part—the following references, which will suffice to establish our point:

"Townley Myst. p. 110:

Come Colle and his maroo,
They wille nyp us fulle naroo," referring to one of the pastores, and ib.:

"A Colle, goode mornce.

Cov. Myst. p. 130: Miles the Myllere and Colle Crakecrust; and Colle seruus occurs as one of the dramatis personae in the Play of the Sacrament.

We look, then, upon Colle as one of the ghost-words that Dr. Murray was quite justified in not taking up.

And so we might go on; but the preceding notes will have served our purpose,

* Glossary to the York Plays.

if they have given our readers an idea of what scanty ears remain to be gleaned after the careful mower has gone over the field. Truly, if the age of Latin titles were not well-nigh gone, we might claim for this work within its judiciously drawn limits the title of "Thesaurus totius Anglicitatis."

But the great merit does not lie in its completeness, nor in the fact that here for the first time we have a mass of reliable material to work upon for the history of the English language. The great interest centres in the treatment of the sense development. Up to the present, nothing, or next to nothing, has been done towards a systematic study of English semasiology. And yet the research would be extremely interesting for the student, and of very great use to others. It is not too much to say that "etymological" dictionaries have hitherto looked upon their etymology from a one-sided point of view. A hint here and there as to a change of meaning is all we find. The greater part of these changes is taken for granted; and as no systematic treatise has ever appeared, the bewildered student who is told that two words totally opposed in sense are "etymologically" the same is left groping in the dark for analogies.

Dr. Murray has a fine sense for "discovering" the most delicate shades of meaning, and the mass of facts bearing upon these problems that one finds here discussed is enormous. We should not dwell upon this theme so long were it not that we have hardly ever found this characteristic of the Oxford Dictionary brought out before. If asked for instances, almost every second article might be pointed out; but such words as coarse, cloud, come—the latter especially, which takes up twenty-three columns—may be mentioned as some of the more conspicuous in this respect. The analogies given under this and other words, such as coax, present as near an approach to a systematic treatise on these matters as can be expected in a work like the present. For, however frequent the hints, we should of course not look for a fully developed system of semasiology in these pages. Without regard to the facts given, our own impression is that Dr. Murray in some instances goes too far, and thinks too many subdivisions justified to be able to keep it up throughout the rest of the work. In the case, e.g., of such a word as common sense, we find the fact that some quotations present the word in a more emphatic sense taken as basis for a subdivision (sub 2). We are of course thankful—let it be stated most emphatically—for every grain of information on a subject so interesting. It is not that we have hitherto been spoilt by over-feeding. But if a more emphatic use necessitates a splitting up of the significations for this word, are we not justified in looking for similar divisions everywhere? Again, Dr. Murray makes a special heading for the metonymic use of coach = the passengers, as in "The coach dines here"—i.e., the container for the thing contained. Once more we ask, Can this be kept up? Will it be possible to give henceforth all metonymic and metaphorical usages of words under a separate heading? We know that here, too, the difficulty consists "where to draw the line," our senses are too obtuse to make distinctions. We can only say that ourselves should not like to be given in the Dictionary by placing ourselves at the risk of one overlooking the whole, and we discover difficulties.

But we find we are trespassing; we have ourselves made form. We are not reviewing a treatise in logic, but a Lexicon, where for the first time a solution is attempted, which baffle the student at every point, where the sense development is not all, but a secondary part. It is said again: No praises seem to us to be due to this feature of the work.

We wish to conclude by saying a few words about a class of words of which some have been given in the Dictionary—words which were used for the first time by Caxton, and which have lately had occasion to inquire especially into Caxton's way of appropriating foreign words out of the languages which he translated. We did so at the end of his Reynard the Foxe, which is confessedly a translation of a Dutch text—the one, may add, that was published in 1479 by Gheraert Leeu at Gouda. It is well known that Caxton adapted "all sorts and conditions" of French words. He found difficulty in using the verb to communicate. Dr. Murray records three instances of the verb, and all three from Caxton. Nor would it be easy, we venture to surmise, to find it in any other writer. Caxton simply took it straight from French. Of course, Dr. Murray knows this as well as anybody else. Why, then, does he include it? Let us consider some other forms before answering this question. We find here clope in the sense of a "blow," and cluse = a (monastic) cell provided with a single quotation—each from Caxton's Reynard. Have these words ever formed part of the English language? Have they ever been used by anybody else? We fancy we may safely answer No. The fact is, they are taken directly from Dutch. The original has clap and cluse.* By including these without a note of warning (the || before clope denotes either foreign or earlier English words, and † before cluse means merely obsolete), Dr. Murray has left the reader in the dark as to the real position of the words. This proceeding would perhaps seem to be justified where other quotations are found, as in the case of balked, which (vol. i., p. 637, b.) is explained as "stopped short," "pulled up." A reference to the Dutch original (a copy is in the Grenville collection) would, however, have revealed another state of affairs. It has "Isegrym ballech" (p. 41, l. 22) = "he became angry." It is true, as Dr. Murray himself suggested to us, that Caxton may have supposed ballech to mean "stopped short." The suggestion is highly ingenious, nor is it in itself unlikely. Caxton every now and then committed the most

* See p. 142, l. 11, and p. 11, l. 25; we refer here to an edition of the Dutch text, which we hope to bring out early next year, and in the Introduction to which we shall treat more fully of these matters.

and that I had as fascinating a legend on subject and could dress it up as attractively Andrew Lang's story. The very prosaic note which occurred to me as being the of the fisherman's story of the "Lady or Salmon," may be found in *An Angler's
 Tales*, by Ed. Jesse (Van Voorst, 1836), p. 4.

There appears, indeed, to be a fascination in gudgeon fishing, which it is not easy to account and it is mentioned as a fact that the clergyman of a parish in the neighbourhood of Hampton Court, who was engaged to be married to the daughter of a Bishop, enjoyed his gudgeon fishing so much that he arrived too late to be married, and the lady, offended at his neglect, refused to be united to one who appeared to prefer his rod to herself."

I think that the story in some other book is localised at Thames Ditton, and the Bishop becomes the Bishop of London. It is only another instance of a literary coincidence; and readers who may wish to see the growth of the myth should look for it in Angling Sketches in full bloom under the "soft moonlight," and pressed in the "orange blossoms" so daintily induced by the art of Mr. Lang.

SCIENCE.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles; founded mainly on the materials collected by the Philological Society. Edited by James A. H. Murray, with the assistance of many men of science. Part VI. Clo-Consigner. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

If rightly handled, the material contained in this one Part of the Oxford Dictionary would serve as a series of texts for a whole term's university lectures. The reviewer is therefore hampered, not by the paucity, but by the abundance of matter, unless indeed he wishes to content himself with giving a mere rechauffé of the editor's Introduction and Prefaces.

There are so many aspects to this work that we must fain restrict ourselves to some of them, and rest content with mentioning pro memoria only that what the editor calls "identification"—comprising the main form of a word, its pronunciation and accent, the grammatical designation, principal spellings, inflexions, &c.—and the morphology or form-history—including of course its etymology—seem to have been duly considered in every case where there was occasion to do so.

The first question any one is likely to ask with reference to a work of this kind is whether it is complete. It is very difficult to give a categorical answer; and we should prefer to say that the answer depends upon who and what the querist is. Does he wish his lexicographer to act upon the "all-is-fish-that-comes-to-net" principle? It will be allowed on all hands that an essentially scientific work can never adopt that plan. Where must the compiler stop? Dr. Murray rightly speaks of the English vocabulary as presenting the "aspect of one of these nebulous masses familiar to the astronomer, in which a clear and unmistakable nucleus shades off on all sides, through zones of decreasing brightness, to a dim marginal film that seems to end nowhere, but to lose itself imperceptibly in the surrounding darkness."

The difficulty of "where to draw the line" is met by establishing this criterion, that the work is to include "all the common words of literature and conversation, and such of the scientific, technical, slang, dialectal, and foreign words as are passing into common use," &c. Only a man of wide personal knowledge will be able to decide in dubious cases whether a word is common or not; but the standard, if applied with the necessary latitude, seems the only practicable one, however difficult its application may be. If here, too, to err is perhaps inevitable, we must state at the outset that, as a rule, the author would seem to us to have erred on the right side—namely, that in dubiis he has not abstained from including the word. For the older periods no such criterion of course exists.

We fancy that of works that are finished, the Encyclopaedic Dictionary is the one containing the largest vocabulary. It may be interesting, then, to give the following statistics gathered from one page of that work taken at random. Encyclopaedic Dictionary, vol. ii., p. 382, has been compared with the corresponding portion in Dr. Murray's work on p. 744 of the Part before us. The result is that, whereas four forms given in the Encyclopaedic Dictionary are not in the Oxford Dictionary (comprimitt, complicate, compsognatha (does it deserve a special heading by the side of compsognathus?) compt-book (no reference)), no less than fifteen forms are given in Dr. Murray's work of which no trace is found in the other. Similar comparisons might be instituted with regard to the Imperial, the New Webster, and the Century Dictionary. If the results of such comparisons be found to redound to the honour of the work under review, this must not be taken to reflect on the other editors. The fact is that the trite phrase, "a truly national work," is applicable here in its full force. Imposing is the list of the collaborators; and if many foreigners are found among them, such as Sievers and Paul Meyer, the great burden of sub-editing and "reading" has been undertaken by members of the great English-speaking community. Our readers are aware that from time to time Dr. Murray issues lists of desiderata, with a view to discovering earlier or later quotations than those already existing among his collections. List VII., dated October, 1889, now lies before us, and we get an interesting glimpse into the Oxford workshop, if we look up the corresponding portion of the Dictionary itself and compare the result. The first page of that list has 127 entries. In only forty-two cases was no additional information supplied; in eight cases, the item as in the list is not found in the Dictionary—e.g., coactly, for which a 1581-reference seemed at one time to claim a place; and in all the other cases (a majority of 77 to 50) new light has been thrown on the problem presented.

Before laying before the reader some notes on the vocabulary of this Part, we wish to say a word as to the spirit in which we offer them. We cannot help anticipating a construction which might be put upon our words—viz., that the critic picks out some defects "as if to insinuate that he could do the work so much better himself" (ACADEMY, No. 1008, p. 168). Even while remembering the words which accompany the incriminated passage—to the effect that the fault-finding critic almost invariably could not, and, as a matter of fact, does not, do it better—we cannot but dissent from this proposition; and we feel, moreover, convinced that its respected author cannot harbour such pessimistic thoughts about his brother-critics. We offer our notes—however little they come to—in the supposition that some of them may perhaps be useful to users or intending users of the work in question, and especially to give palpable proof of the interest which the work has excited. As this selection is intended to be representative, the words discussed may serve to point to the character of the Dictionary:

Close, adj. 9. An interesting illustration of this adj., "not open to public access or competition," is found in "close-fellowships." This might have been given, especially as the work is written for foreigners as well as for Englishmen. Illustrations may be found in Hoppe.

Close-quarters. The same authority quotes an important weakened use of this word: "We are in rather close quarters here." The writer—Trollope—has evidently lost sight of its original application in naval matters, and has come under the influence of the sense of the separate words.

Cloth—table-cloth (2); in a metaphorical sense—what is unessential to the dinner-party; the food itself being the essential part: "it takes 930 pages . . . Half that number would have been ample for what story there is to tell. . . . In presenting us with 'more cloth than dinner'—to use a well-known Northern phrase . . . etc." (ACADEMY, September 3, 1887, p. 148). In the teeth of the warning phrase about dialect, we do not insist that it should have been included. But to many readers it would have been useful if it had been.

Soit bele, ou lede, ou povre, ou riche :
Car il dit, et por voir l'afiche,
En son noble livre Aureole,
Qui bien fait à lire en escole,
Qu'il i a vie trop grevaine,
Plaine de travail et de paine, &c."
(v. 9310 ff.)

We learn from John of Salisbury, in fact, that Saint Jerome calls the work Aureolus liber de Nuptiis :

"Fertur authore Hieronimo, aureolus Theophrasti liber de Nuptiis, in quo quaerit an vir sapiens ducat uxorem"—the decision being: "Non est uxor ducenda sapienti."

The name of the work occurs again in the Epistola Valerii ad Rufinum, which ends with the advice: "Lege Aureolum Theophrasti et Medeam Nasonis," et vix pauca invenies mulieri impossibilia." It is probably owing, therefore, to "Valerius," i.e., Walter Map, that Jean de Meun (see Langlois: Origines et Sources du Roman de la Rose, p. 141), and consequently Chaucer, became acquainted with the Aureolus of Theophrastus. Map, in his turn, was most likely indebted for his knowledge of the Aureolus to the Polyeraticus (written between 1156 and 1159) with which he was certainly familiar; for he borrowed from it the title of his own book De Nugis Curialium, the full title of John of Salisbury's treatise being Polyeraticus de Nugis Curialium et Vestigiis Philosophorum.

Chaucer himself doubtless was as completely in the dark as his commentators have been as to the authorship of the "book cleped Valerie," and suspected as little as they that it was the work of a distinguished countryman of his own. Nor was Jean de Meun any better informed, for he ends a quotation from "Valerius" with the words: "Ainsinc le dient li paien," thus conclusively showing that he took him to be a pagan writer.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

P.S.—Since the above was written I have come across an interesting passage in Richard de Bury's Philobiblon, in which, curiously enough, I again find Theophrastus and Valerius coupled together as they are in the passage I have quoted from the "Wyf of Bathes Prologue." M. Cocheris, in a note to his translation of the passage in the Philobiblon, refers, as a matter of course, to the Characteres of Theophrastus, and to the De Dictis Factisque Memorabilibus of Valerius Maximus. There is not a doubt, however, that the reference here again is to the Aureolus of Theophrastus, and to the Epistola Valerii. Richard de Bury formulates a Complaint of his Books against their various enemies. Their most implacable foe, they say, is that two-footed brute, woman ("bestia bipedalis, scilicet mulier"). After recounting the various injuries they have received from her, they confess that her hostility towards them would be justified if she knew their inmost thoughts, and could read, say, the book of Theophrastus or that of Valerius, or could hear read the twenty-fifth chapter of Ecclesiasticus :

"Ista bestia nostris studiis semper aemula, nullo die placanda, finaliter nos conspectos in angulo jam defunctae araneae sola tela protectos, in rugam fronte collecta, virulentis sermonibus detrahit et subsannat. . . Et quidem merito, si videret intrinseca cordis nostri; si nostris privatis interfuisset consiliis; si Theophrasti vel Valerii perlegisset volumen, vel saltem Ecclesiastici 25 capitulum auribus intellectus audisset." (Philobiblon, cap. iv.)

In the chapter of Ecclesiasticus referred to we read (v. 13), "Give me any wickedness, but the wickedness of woman;" (v. 16), "I had rather dwell with a lion and a dragon, than to keep house with a wicked woman"; (v. 19), "All wickedness is but little to the wickedness of a woman." I have already pointed out that both the Aureolus of Theophrastus and the Epistola Valerii contain similar diatribes against women.

Richard de Bury probably got his knowledge of the Aureolus from John of Salisbury's Polyeraticus, which he mentions more than once in the Philobiblon; unless, indeed, he too derived it at secondhand from the Epistola Valerii. With the latter he was certainly acquainted, for we happen to know that he possessed a copy of it. In return for certain services rendered by him to the Abbey of Saint Albans, when Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Abbot presented him with a number of MSS. from the library of the Abbey, among which were Terentius, Virgilius, Quintilianus, and Sauctus Hieronymus contra Rufinum. This last, as I have shown above, is none other than Walter Map's Epistola Valerii ad Rufinum, which was commonly attributed to Saint Jerome.

I may add that, in the Prologue to his Quinze Joyes de Mariage, Antoine de la Sale, comparing married men to fish caught in a net, which, struggle as they may, can never get free again, remarks :

"Pour ce dist ung docteur appellé Valere à ung sien ami qui s'estoit marié, et qui luy demandoit s'il avoit bien fait, et le docteur lui respont en ceste manière: 'Ami, dit-il, n'avez-vous peu trouver une haulte fenestre, pour vous laisser trébucher en une grosse ryvière, pour vous mectre dedens la teste la première?'"

La Sale's "docteur Valere" is doubtless the Valerius of Walter Map's Epistola ad Rufinum. The passage cited, however, does not anywhere appear in the Epistola. It seems to be a vague recollection of the lines in the Sixth Satire of Juvenal :

"Ferre potes dominam salvis tot restibus ulla,
Quum pateant altae caligantesque fenestras,
Quum tibi vicinum se praebeat aemilius pons?"

Like many another medieval writer, La Sale no doubt quoted from memory, without troubling to verify his references.

P.P.S.—It appears that I have done Tyrwhitt an injustice in saying that he gives no conjecture as to the authorship of the Epistola Valerii. Prof. Skeat informs me that in the Introductory Discourse to the "Canterbury Tales" (note 19) Tyrwhitt states with regard to the Epistola :

"Tanner (from Wood's MS. Coll.) attributes it to Walter Map; v. Bib. Brit. sv. Map."

From the fact that this attribution has so long remained unverified, it would appear to have been regarded as a somewhat hazardous conjecture. P. T.

A PASSAGE IN THE OLD ENGLISH CHRONICLE.
Oxford: Dec. 9, 1891.

In the entry for the year 1086, the Peterborough Chronicle (MS. Laud, 636, fol. 64^b) has the following sentence: "And he hæfde eorlond on Englelande, and þonne se cyng on Normandige, þonne was he mægest on þisum lande." (Over the t of mægest is the ordinary sign of contraction used in the MS., consisting of a short horizontal line.)

All the editors of the Chronicle have found a difficulty in the word mægest, which most of them (Gibson, Ingram, and Thorpe) print mægeste, regarding it as a superlative. Gibson (in his translation) renders mægeste by "primus;" Ingram translates it "the mightiest man;" Thorpe and Stevenson (the latter in his translation of the Chronicle in the Church Historians of England, 1853) "the most powerful man." Earle prints mægest, rendering it in his glos-sarial index, p. 425, by "powerful."

In reality, the sentence is at all, nor is there the slightest coining of a word merely to suit no such superlative as mægest in English. A most simple action at once suggests itself (and suggested itself to many students which at once makes the passage and intelligible. All that is required to expand mægest into mægester (the English loan word from Latin ma) translate: "then was he master." That the sign of contraction in Old English is perfectly well known to students of Old English; after is, for very commonly written æft, and, in instance of this very word so written the very same page of the Laud MS. passage. It is true that the form m is not so common as magister, which retains Latin spelling, but plenty of instances are found: cf. Exodus i. 11, Wituldlice him weorca mægestras = Præposuit ita magistros operum.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "DISMAL."

Cambridge: Dec. 9, 1891

As a not altogether irrelevant contribution to the controversy on the derivation of "dismal" I send you the following literal translation of an Icelandic record lately published in the Diplomatarium Islandicum (III. i., p. 183-4). The oldest vellum it occurs in (A. M. 350 Fol. dates, according to Dr. Kålund's excellent Catalogue of the Arna-Magnæan Collections at Copenhagen, from circa 1363. Dr. J. Thorkelsson, the editor of the Diplomatarium, is inclined to think the vellum may even be older.

"Here is a statement concerning dismala dags [acc.]. There are two such days in every month as in calendric language* are called dies mali, being interpreted evil days; in each one of them there is one hour during which all cures by which people hope for their health are of no avail, unless God will heal (them) through miracles.

- The first of them is the vijth day of Yule, the ninth hour. (Jan. 1.)
- The second is Paul's Mass and the vijth hour. (Jan. 25.)
- In February it is the next day after Blasius' Mass and the vijth hour. (Feb. 3.)
- The second ij nights before Peter's Mass, and the xth hour. (Feb. 20.)
- In March the first day, and the first hour. (Mar. 1.)
- The second v nights after Mary's Mass, and the second hour. (Mar. 30.)
- In April vj nights after Ambrosius' Mass, and the first hour. (Ap. 10.)
- The second iij nights before the Mass of John the bishop of Holar, and the xith hour. (Ap. 20.)
- In May the Cross Mass, and the vijth hour. (May 3.)
- The second Urbanus' Mass, and the xth hour. (May 25.)
- In June in festo Medardi and Gildardi, and the sixth hour. (June 8.)
- The second one night before Botolf's Mass, and the iijth hour. (June 16.)
- In July ij. nights after the Translation of Benedict, and the xijth hour. (July 13.)
- The second in festo Marie Magdalene, and the xith hour. (July 22.)
- In August the first, and the first hour. (Aug. 1.)
- The second in festo Felicis, and the vijth hour. (Aug. 30.)
- In September ij nights after Egidius' Mass, and the third hour. (Sep. 3.)
- The second in festo Mathel apostoli and evangeliste, and the iijth hour. (Sep. 21.)
- In October one night before festum Francisci, and the xth hour. (Oct. 3.)

approaching the Bayreuth master will fully explain, if not excuse, the sneering opinion expressed.

It may be said that Wagner is still an open question, and that Mr. Statham is not the only intelligent and thoughtful writer who disbelieves in the new art-theories. Let us see how he speaks of the heaven-born genius Schubert. Most musicians share Sir G. Grove's enthusiasm for this composer, but not Mr. Statham.

"Schubert's attitude towards the art [of music] was throughout his life that of a very gifted amateur. . . . The belief in Schubert's greatness as an instrumental composer is, however, a forced one; and the more the public learn about musical composition and musical form, the more certainly they will eventually find this out."

And, again, Schubert's Symphonies are described as "uninteresting, unpolished, and full of vain repetitions." Of course one must be quite fair to Mr. Statham. He probably feels the beauty and the grandeur of Schubert's music as intensely as Sir G. Grove; but when he comes to write about it, on go the spectacles, and Schubert is found wanting. It is possible for the critic to pick holes in the master's music, to point out "vain repetitions," to discover mannerisms; and at certain times this is quite lawful. But in an essay for general readers, to magnify the weak points and almost entirely to hide the qualities which make the music so powerful, is wrong and misleading. Schubert so takes hold of anyone with natural feeling for what is grand and beautiful, that the flaws, the repetitions, the lengths no more interfere with the magic spell of the music than does the rounded form of the eighteenth century with the wonderful creations of Mozart. Moreover, there are works of Schubert in which no fault can be found—works in presence of which the cleverest critic stands mute, and feels almost ashamed of his profession.

To see Mr. Statham, however, in his boldest mood, the chapter on "Beethoven" must be read. The famous horn passage in the first movement of the "Eroica" is an offence against the "logic of harmonic progression"; the dropping of the characteristic rhythm in the Allegretto of the Seventh Symphony is the one blemish "on the symmetry of this movement"; the introductory bars of the Choral Symphony are "a mere eccentricity of the composer." And many more statements of a similar kind might be given. Anything, in fact, which disturbs regularity of rhythm or form disturbs Mr. Statham.

It is pleasant to turn to the pages on Chopin, whose "nearly perfect works [are] elaborated and polished down to the minutest details." Mr. Statham writes in a thoroughly sympathetic mood about the Polish composer. It is interesting to note that "the classic forms of composition somewhat fettered him"—just, in fact, as they have fettered our author in his judgments on Beethoven, Wagner, and Schubert.

The last chapter is devoted to Sterndale Bennett; and, without agreeing with every statement, many musicians will probably commend Mr. Statham for setting in the strongest light one of England's most meritorious composers. But he opens his chapter with a discordant note. "A man of rare and individual genius" may, or may not, be the right phrase to describe Sterndale Bennett; but it sounds fulsome from one who speaks of Schubert as a "gifted amateur."

Other chapters, dealing with Handel, Bach, and Mozart, are not so objectionable, but our space has already been filled. Mr. Statham's views on the past rather than the present, and the courage of his opinions, clearly, is logical, and shows, as he says in his preface, that he has given much thought to his subject. The essays are for the most part reprints from the Edinburgh and Fortnightly, but with revision and additions.

MUSIC NOTES.

BRAMHMS'S new songs were repeated at the last Saturday Popular Concert of the year; they were again admirably sung by the same vocalists, and were received with enthusiasm. The Gipsy Songs, especially, are likely to become great favourites. Mme. Haas played Beethoven's Sonata in E minor (Op. 90). Her reading was correct, but she only touched, as it were, the surface of the music. A clever and graceful Larghetto and Allegretto for 'cello with pianoforte accompaniment, by Dr. Mackenzie, was performed by Mr. Whitehouse with good taste and tone. Time flies, but not the Popular Concert programme book. A notice of the composer mentioned "The Bride," the Cantata produced in 1881, as his most recent work. The concert concluded with Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor.

THE twenty-first series of Mr. Dannreuther's Musical Evenings at Orme-square will commence on January 8, 1892, and the dates of the remaining evenings will be January 19, February 2 and 16. The following instrumentalists are announced: first violin, Messrs. A. Gibson, and S. D. Grimson; viola, Mr. E. Kreuz; 'cello, Mr. C. Ould; with Mr. Dannreuther, as usual, at the pianoforte. Miss Anna Williams will be the vocalist. At the first concert will be performed J. S. Bach's Variations on an Aria in G major, known as the Goldberg Variations. It was the first important work of its kind, and is still a wonder. They were written for a harpsichord with two rows of keys; and to give due effect to them on one keyboard must be a matter of extreme difficulty.

WE are pleased to learn that Mr. E. F. Jacques has been appointed editor of the Musical Times, in place of the late W. A. Barrett. During his short management of the Musical World, Mr. Jacques displayed both energy and ability, and would therefore seem to be the right man in the right place.
